The House passed the bill granting a pension of $12 per month to this widow, and the Senate reduced the amount to $8 per month under the impression that the soldier served in the war with the Indians prior to or subsequent to the war of the rebellion. In fact, the soldier served during the war of the rebellion and lost his life by reason of wounds received in battle during that time, and is entitled to a pension of $12 per month.

The effect of the agreement of the conferees is to give the widow of the soldier, who lost his life by reason of wounds received in battle during the war of the rebellion, a pension of $12 per month.

FLORENCE N. WALDRON.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8245) granting a pension to Florence N. Waldron, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

GEO. W. RAY,
E. S. HENBY,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. H. GALLINGER,
H. C. HANSBROUGH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the conferees on the part of the House was read, as follows:

The House passed the bill restoring to Florence N. Waldron her pension of $20 per month. This amount had been awarded her by the Bureau of Pensions, but the pension was dropped on the ground that she was not otherwise permanently helpless within the meaning of the law. The House found that Florence N. Waldron was and always had been permanently helpless within the meaning of the law, and that she was therefore entitled to the $20 per month given her by the general law if permanently helpless from infancy.

The Senate reduced this amount to $12 per month, not taking into consideration the rank of the father, which entitled this child to $20 per month under the general law if permanently helpless within its meaning.

This fact being brought to the attention of the Senate conferees, they readily acquiesce in the rate fixed by the House. The disagreement was the result of a misapprehension.

It should be understood that when a pension is continued to the insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless child of a soldier, the rate is determined by the amount to which the soldier or widow is entitled under the general law, and this rate in the case of a private is $12 per month, and in the case of an officer may vary from $15 to $30 per month.

Dated May 24, 1898.

Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

JOHN B. HAYS.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8834) granting a pension to John B. Hays, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

GEO. W. RAY,
W. S. KERR,
Managers on the part of the House.
GEORGE L. SHOUP,
FRANK J. CANNON,
M. A. HANNA,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The House passed the bill granting to this soldier, who fought in many hard battles and rose from private to the rank of major, a pension of $30 per month. He resides in the city of New York, and has a wife and two daughters dependent on him for support. He is no longer able to earn anything either by mental or physical labor, and is very poor.

The Senate reduced this amount to $20 per month, but after full and fair conference and an examination of the facts is satisfied, through its conferees, that the soldier, on account of his rank and brilliant service and disabilities incurred in the service, is entitled to the full amount given by the House, and has therefore receded from its amendment, and the effect of the conference report is to give to this soldier a pension of $30 per month.

Dated May 24, 1898.

EDMUND H. DRIGGS,
W. S. KERR,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

JOHN X. GRIFFITH.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8836) granting an increase of pension to John X. Griffith, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

GEO. W. RAY,
V. WARNER,
J. D. BOTKIN,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. H. GALLINGER,
JOHN L. MITCHELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the conferees was read, as follows:

The House passed the bill increasing the pension of this soldier from $8 to $50 per month. He was a good soldier, and a prisoner in the hands of the Confederates for many months, where he contracted the disabilities from which he has never recovered. He is totally blind, very poor, and has no one to support him. He is 60 years of age.

The Senate reduced this amount to $30 per month upon the theory that $30 per month would be sufficient to give this man reasonable care. After full and free conference, the Senate through its conferees is of the opinion that $50 per month is a reasonable amount to give this soldier. The Senate conferees have heard the statements of those who served with John X. Griffith and knew him personally in the Army and knew his sufferings and disabilities incurred therein.

The effect of the conference report is to leave this soldier's pension at $30 per month.

Dated May 24, 1898.

J. D. BOTKIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

CALVIN P. LYNN.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3953) granting an increase of pension to Calvin P. Lynn, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

GEO. W. RAY,
S. W. SMITH,
J. D. BOTKIN,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. H. GALLINGER,
H. C. HANSBROUGH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the conferees on the part of the House was read, as follows:

The House passed the bill increasing from $8 to $20 per month the pension of Calvin P. Lynn, who had a long and faithful service and who is very poor and unable to earn anything for his own support.

His disabilities would entitle him to $30 per month, if of service origin. The conferees have agreed that this soldier has disabilities of service origin that entitle him to a pension of at least $20 per month, and the Senate has therefore receded from its amendment and the effect of the conference agreement is to give this soldier a pension of $20 per month.

Dated May 24, 1898.

J. D. BOTKIN,
S. W. SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

SUSPENSION OF LAWS RELATING TO THE QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table House bill 10121, to suspend the operations of certain provisions of law relating to the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and for other purposes, wherein the Senate disagrees to the conference report and asks for a further conference.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, can we have the amendments read?

Mr. MARSH. This is not a conference report. The Senate disagreed to the conference report and asked for a further conference. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment and agree to the conference as requested by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HULL, Mr. GRIFFIN, and Mr. HAY.

REPRINT OF PUBLIC ACT NO. 67.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the House that a large number of members have asked me to ask unanimous consent for the reprint of public act No. 67, which was to provide for the temporary increase of the military force of the United States in time of war. A large number of members are receiving applications for that act, and the edition is exhausted.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is that the volunteer bill?

Mr. HULL. That is the volunteer bill. I ask for a reprint of 3,000 copies of the volunteer act.

Mr. PERKINS. Do I understand that the number that was printed and sent to the folding room to the credit of members has been exhausted?

Mr. HULL. I have been so informed to-day by fifteen or twenty members, that there are no more there and that the edition was exhausted some time ago.

Mr. PERKINS. Is it proposed to send these to the document room or the folding room?

Mr. HULL. I propose to have them sent to the document room and placed to the credit of members.

Mr. PERKINS. In the former instance they were sent to the folding room and put to the credit of members. The expense, Mr. Speaker, is small.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the reprint of 3,000 copies of the volunteer act, No. 67. Is there objection?

Mr. PERKINS. I think it should be designated, Mr. Speaker, what disposition is to be made of them. In the former instance we passed a resolution providing for the reprint of 30,000 copies, and sent them to the folding room to the credit of members.

Mr. HULL. If anyone wants it that way, I have no objection to including that in my motion, but I believe that in that way you will have a surplus for some members and not enough for others. Some members have no call for them, while other members have a call for a very large number.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not care whether they go to the document room or the folding room, but I think it ought to be designated in the motion.

Mr. HULL. I will include in my motion that they go to the folding room to be placed to the credit of members.

The motion was agreed to.

REPRINT OF PUBLIC ACT NO. 70.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of 1,000 copies of public act No. 70, for the better organization of the Army, to be sent to the folding room.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if you print 1,000 copies it should go to the document room. Each member would only get two and a fraction copies, and I fear it would hardly serve the purpose that the gentleman has in view.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] what would be the difference in the cost of printing 5,000 copies instead of 1,000? Is it very much more?

Mr. PERKINS. No; the cost is not very great.

Mr. HULL. I fixed this number of copies because the superintendent of the folding room said that 1,000 copies of this bill would be all that was needed. He said of the other act 3,000 would answer the call, and so it was fixed at that number.

Mr. PERKINS. I think it would be preferable to have these additional copies go to the document room, and then so long as the supply lasts any member who has a demand for copies can get them there; but if they are apportioned among members and sent to the folding room—

Mr. HULL. I preferred in the beginning that they should go to the document room, but some members objected. I submit the motion in that form.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think the folding room preferable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why not make the number 1,100, so as to give each member three copies?

The motion of Mr. HULL as modified was agreed to.

RAILROADS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8349) granting additional powers to railroad companies created by the laws of the United States and operating lines in the Indian Territory. I wish to ask concurrence in these amendments.

The amendments were read, as follows:

On page 1, lines 3 and 4, strike out "created by or existing under the laws of the United States."

On page 2, line 2, strike out "paralleling and" and insert "parallel or." Amend the title so as to read: "An act granting additional powers to railroad companies operating lines in the Indian Territory."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What effect will these amendment have?

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill as passed contains the language "paralleling and competing lines." One of these amendments strikes out the words "paralleling and" and inserts the words "parallel or."

The other amendment is this: The bill as passed applied only to such railroads as may have been incorporated under the laws of the United States. In its amended form the bill is extended to railroads incorporated under the laws of the States.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate; and they were concurred in.

MARY ANN SULLIVAN.

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent to have taken up and passed the bill (H. R. 6525) granting a pension to Mary Ann Sullivan.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BENNETT. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ask whether this is not a bill that might more properly be considered at a Friday night session—whether it differs in any respect from other private pension bills?

Mr. SULZER. I would say that this bill was passed over last Friday night and, I believe, the Friday night previous.

Mr. BENNETT. Then I object.

DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. EVANS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 10253) to amend the internal-revenue laws relating to distilled spirits, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. LACEY in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 10253.

Mr. EVANS. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. SULZER. I object.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. SULZER (before the reading was concluded). I do not insist on the further reading of the bill.

Mr. EVANS. I renew the request that the first reading be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, before we begin the consideration of this bill I wish to say that this is a unanimous report of the Ways and Means Committee. The matter has received great consideration at the hands of the committee; and I do not know that there is any opposition to the bill. I understand, however, that as we have not had any talk on politics in the House for some time, several gentlemen desire to occupy time in general debate. I therefore ask unanimous consent that not exceeding two hours be allowed for general debate, to be divided equally between the two sides—the time on this side to be controlled, I presume, by myself, and by some other gentleman on the other side. I ask that general debate be closed at quarter before 5 o'clock.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then the bill will not get through to-night.

Mr. EVANS. If it be more agreeable that general debate be limited to one hour, all right.

Mr. SULZER. Why not proceed with the bill now under the five-minute rule?

Mr. EVANS. I think that is a good suggestion; I thank the gentleman for it. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be now closed.

Mr. GROW. I desire to occupy some time.

Mr. EVANS. I will see that the gentleman gets the time he desires.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is it understood that under the five-minute rule we shall be allowed liberal extensions?

Mr. EVANS. Undoubtedly.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that general debate be now closed. Is there objection?

Mr. BROMWELL. I wish to occupy from fifteen to twenty minutes; and if I am to be cut off by the five-minute rule, or obliged to get my speech in by pieces under various paragraphs of the bill, I shall have to object.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I also desire to occupy some time.

Mr. GROW. I suggest that the time allowed for debate be one hour and a half.

Mr. BENNETT. Say an hour all together.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I renew my suggestion that we have an hour and a half of general debate, to be divided equally between the respective sides.

The CHAIRMAN. An hour and a half on a side, or an hour and a half all together?

Mr. EVANS. All together.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that there be general debate for an hour and a half, at the end of which time the general debate shall be closed upon the bill, the time to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Kentucky and one-half by whom upon the other side?

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman from Tennessee or the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to make some remarks, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EVANS. I suggest the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN], who is on the committee.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I have no desire to talk, and I will yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who is anxious, I understand, to oppose the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman moves to waive the reading of the bill. Now, we know nothing about its provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. That has been already done. The question is when the general debate shall close.

Mr. MAXWELL. There ought to be sufficient time to discuss the bill thoroughly, and I am opposed to limiting the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I suggest that the gentleman make it two hours.

Mr. EVANS. I am willing.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will say that if two hours are taken for general debate, this bill can not be completed to-night.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why can we not complete it to-morrow?

Mr. EVANS. To-morrow will be Friday.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentlemen who are interested in the bill and have been pressing upon the Ways and Means Committee to report it say that it is exceedingly important that it should become a law at the earliest possible moment. If there are to be general speeches on other subjects, then we can take up the rest of the summer; but I think it is very important that the bill should become a law at as early a date as possible.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let the debate run, and then move to close debate.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important measure—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I exceedingly regret that we could not reach some agreement about this matter, for the convenience of the House. If I thought there was any disposition to discuss the merits of the bill itself, I should be perfectly willing to yield all the time necessary for that, but inasmuch as there was a proposition simply to talk politics for an hour and a half, I was hoping that all would agree to limit debate to that time. I understand the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MAXWELL] objects. I should be very sorry to know that he insists upon that objection. I ask that the request be renewed for an hour and a half of general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. An hour and a half altogether?

Mr. EVANS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That proposition has already been submitted, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MAXWELL] has objected.

Mr. PAYNE. Make it an hour and forty minutes.

Mr. EVANS. I ask that there be an hour and forty minutes of general debate.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That will be satisfactory to the gentleman from Nebraska.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. EVANS] asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed in an hour and forty minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad now to have the attention of the House to a short discussion of the merits of the bill.

I believe I can truthfully say that I never consume any portion of the time of the House in discussing political questions upon bills of practical moment.

This is a bill of great interest alike to a large number of the people and business men of the country and to the Government itself. It will, I think, very beneficially affect the revenues of the Government, and this is a time when we should be very careful about that. The bill, while, in my judgment, giving the country largely increased revenues, will also afford relief to a large number of business men who need it. I do not intend now to occupy much of the time of the committee. I shall very briefly outline the provisions of this bill and will then yield to others to speak until they have exhausted some portion of the time, when, if any gentleman desires to ask me questions, I shall be ready to answer them.

It is known to all who have given any attention to the internal-revenue laws that under the act of 1894, commonly called the Wilson bill, what is known as the bonded period was extended from three years to eight years. When that was done, what is known as the evaporation or outage period—that is to say, the period of time during which those portions of the spirits which evaporated were not taxed—was only extended from three years to four years, leaving a term of four years during which there was no allowance for what are called outages. In other words, under that law the spirits were allowed to remain in bond eight years before the taxes were due, but the allowances for the leakage or evaporation which necessarily occurs from natural causes during this long process of perfecting the spirits were not extended over the last four years of the bonded period.

This change in the law, as fully shown in the report of the committee, has been disastrous.

It was an experiment. Nobody understood how that law would operate. There was no precedent for it. No man could forecast its operations. It has turned out to be a very remarkable anomaly, and one that threatens to bring great disasters upon those who manufacture distilled spirits and upon the Government itself through them, as the Government is largely interested from a certain standpoint in the success of those who make the spirits. This bill is the result of a great deal of consideration by the Committee on Ways and Means, of a very large number of bills on the subject introduced in the House during this session.

The first section of this bill reduces the bonded period from eight years to seven years, and the second section extends the outage period from four years to seven years. There never was any wisdom in having these two periods distinct or different. It is essential to the successful operation of the law that the two periods should be coincident and coextensive. The second section therefore extends the outage period to seven years, so that it coincides with the bonded period, which is reduced from eight years to seven. This harmonizes the law and protects the distilling interests against one of the most serious disasters that has ever threatened them, viz, the enormous depreciation in value of the spirits over four years old to which the outage law does not apply further.

The other sections of the bill are desired by the Internal-Revenue Office to remedy certain defects in the law, by requiring stamps to be put upon certain packages which are extensively used by illicit operators in their efforts to evade payment of the taxes. Other minor provisions of some importance are also suggested by the Internal-Revenue Office.

With this brief outline and general statement of the features of the bill, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL], who wishes to leave the House in a short time. The gentleman introduced one of the bills the committee considered, and his bill is largely incorporated in the second section of the one under consideration. I yield to him ten minutes.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, the only provision of this bill upon which I wish to speak is the one that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. EVANS] has already referred to, extending the outage period, so called, from four years to seven.

I want to say to those who have received communications from their constituents regarding the outage bill which was introduced by me some two or three months ago, and about which a very extensive correspondence has been had by gentlemen representing the whisky interests, the cooperage interests, and the warehouse, insurance, and banking interests of the country with members of this House, that the provisions of the bill which I introduced and the passage of which these gentlemen have advocated are incorporated in this bill exactly as they were in mine, except that my bill called for an extension of the outage period from four years to eight, while this increases the outage period to seven years only.

That change is made by reason of the fact that this bill provides for a reduction of the bonded period, so that the outage period is made to correspond, as it ought to, with the bonded period. Now it may be that some members of the House do not understand this outage period, and I will briefly explain it. It is a very simple matter.

Under the law as it now stands the manufacturer or distiller of whisky can place his whisky when first distilled in a bonded warehouse, giving to the Government his bond for the payment of the tax when the whisky is drawn out and used. He can allow that whisky to remain in the bonded warehouse for a period of eight years, as the law now stands, or for seven years in case the bill which we are now considering goes into effect.

He does not have to pay any tax at all upon this whisky in bond until it is drawn out, but at the end of the fourth year, if he allows his whisky to remain in bond after four years, the whisky in every barrel or package is gauged, and the gauge then taken fixes the taxable amount for that barrel or package of whisky, no matter when it is afterwards drawn out of bond.

Now, there is an allowance under the present law for the evaporation, leakage, and absorption which necessarily takes place in these barrels and packages stored in the warehouse. That allowance under the present law is 2½ gallons a year, or 9 gallons for the four years of the present outage period. That allowance ceases at the end of four years, and while the loss still goes on at about the same rate as it did during the first four years, the owner of that whisky is not allowed any reduction when he comes to pay his tax on what has evaporated after the fourth year.

The result of that is as follows: Suppose we assume that during the fifth year there has been an evaporation of 2 more gallons—which is less than the allowance that the law now makes for each of the first four years—at the end of the fifth year, if he proposes to take the whisky out of bond, he will pay $1.10 on each of the 2 gallons that have gone into the air or into the wood. In other words, that barrel of whisky stands him in by way of taxes $2.20 on whisky that is not in the barrel, but has disappeared.

Now, at the end of the next year, the sixth year, he will be out $4.40 by reason of this evaporation. At the end of the seventh year he will be out $6.60 for the same reason. As the result of this, the whisky which went into bond in 1892 and 1893, if tax paid and withdrawn to-day, would be paying a much higher rate of tax than the whisky drawn out at the end of the fourth year; or, in other words, the 1892 and 1893 whisky, by continuing in bond from four to six years, will be paying a higher rate of taxes per gallon on what is left in the barrel than whisky which has been put in bond since that time.

Mr. SHUFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. Yes.

Mr. SHUFORD. Will not the advance in the price make up for that?

Mr. BROMWELL. I will answer that question by saying that that is about the first question that suggests itself to one who is not informed on the subject. The same thought came to my mind when this question was first propounded to me, and I was answered when I asked the question of the whisky men, "Does not the increased value and the increased price for which you can sell this old whisky more than compensate for that loss by evaporation?"

I am assured by those gentlemen who are interested in this manufacture, and I am assured by an inspection of the price lists, that the profit on old whisky upon the market to-day, with the advance in the price that can be obtained for its greater age, is not at all commensurate with the loss per gallon by reason of the tax on the evaporation. The 1892 and 1893 whiskies can be bought on the market for less than 1894, 1895, and 1896 whiskies. This was clearly shown by Mr. J. G. Pontefract, president of the Eastern Rye Whisky Distillers' Association, in his statement before the Ways and Means Committee of the House. He said:

GENTLEMEN: This bill (H. R. 7345) is intended to correct a certain inequality in the manner of collecting tax on whisky.

By the present law whisky may remain in bond for eight years, but tax is assessed and collected upon the amount in cask at the end of four years.

Whisky is an exceedingly volatile substance; in practice it is kept in oak casks, stored in dry warehouses, in a moderately warm temperature—say 80°. Evaporation under these conditions is continuous, nor could it be prevented or lessened.

This evaporation constitutes the "loss of spirits without the fault or negligence of the distiller or owner thereof," used in the present law, and repeated in lines 19 to 25 of this bill. The quantities thus lost during certain periods of time have been ascertained by the experience of distillers and by officers of the internal-revenue service to be substantially as set forth in lines 26 to 32 of the bill. The law as it now stands does not tax this loss during the first forty-eight months, but thereafter all loss occurring is taxed.

The result is that we do, in fact, have different rates of taxation on whisky under the excise laws of the United States:

1. One dollar and ten cents per gallon on whisky from one day to four years old;
2. About $1.15 on whisky from four to five years old;
3. About $1.20 on whisky from five to six years old;
4. About $1.25 on whisky from six to seven years old; and
5. About $1.35 on whisky from seven to eight years old.

This additional tax is made up of tax paid on quantities in excess of the amount withdrawn from the distillery warehouse, and is ascertained by dividing the amount of tax paid by the number of gallons withdrawn. This, then, is the inequality of which we complain and which we ask Congress to correct. We want the domestic tax on whisky to be uniform throughout the United States; not $1.10 in localities where raw spirit is sold, as against $1.35 in Pennsylvania, where old whisky is the distiller's product.

The Constitution requires uniformity. (Article VIII, section 1.) The suggestion that an ad valorem tax might be laid, value to be based on difference in ages, will not bear examination. There are no brands of whisky on the market worth more when new than others at six years old.

The relief for which we ask is necessary to enable us to tax pay and put into consumption the large oversupply of whisky now in bond, distilled in 1892 and 1893. If Congress will change the law so that these goods shall pay no more tax than other whisky, we will be able to dispose of them and meet our obligations to the Government as they become due—that is to say, beginning in the fall of 1899.

If relief is refused, these goods can not be freely distributed in competition with the lower-taxed new whisky. They will continue to drag as they do now, and at the end of their bonded period we shall see them forced into exportation, with all attendant evils and no benefits except to the foreign warehousemen and steamship companies.

Mr. McRAE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. I have not time just now to yield for a question. I will gladly do so later.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me illustrate how the cost to the owner goes up on a barrel of whisky on account of the outage. A barrel holds, we will say, 45 gallons. At the end of the fourth year it has suffered an evaporation of 9 gallons. That leaves 36 gallons in the barrel, and the tax of $1.10 a gallon on this number of gallons makes the tax on the barrel $39.60. At the end of the fifth year 2 more gallons have evaporated, leaving only 34 gallons, which still has to pay the tax of $39.60, or at the rate of $1.17 a gallon instead of $1.10.

At the end of another year, the sixth year, there will be but 32 gallons in the barrel, which still pays $39.60, which is at the rate of $1.24 per gallon; at the end of the seventh year on each of the 30 gallons left, the tax is $1.33; and at the end of the eighth year $1.41; so that the cost of this old whisky to its owner is continually going up by reason of the fact that there is less left in the barrel at the end of every year on which the same amount—$39.60—has to be paid by way of tax; and as the result of that, while the tax goes up the value of the whisky goes down.

Mr. Chairman, I wish here to insert a clear and comprehensive statement of the situation as presented to the Ways and Means Committee by Mr. T. E. McNamara, of Cincinnati, who has given this matter careful consideration and speaks from absolute personal knowledge, gained by many years' experience in the whisky business. As it is too lengthy to read to the House at this time, I will cause it to be printed as a part of my remarks at this point.

GENTLEMEN: I take it for granted that you need scarce be reminded that the interest we represent contributed to the Treasury during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, the sum of $22,008,542.92 of the entire $140,019,590.47 received from all sources during that year.

Let it should occur to you that the measure under consideration contemplates any serious inroad upon the future revenue, I will briefly illustrate, by figures taken from the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to what extent, had it been a law during the last fiscal year, it would have affected the receipts.

Of the 1892 and 1893 distillations—the seasons running from July 1 of one year to June 30 of the next—there were withdrawn during that fiscal year 4,025,058 original gallons of 1892; 8,777,270 original gallons of 1893. Reducing these figures to barrels, there were 85,652 barrels of 1892 and 186,760 barrels of 1893 withdrawn. On the basis of extended allowance that this measure proposes, of 14 gallons outage for each year after the fourth year, and assuming that quantity as the outage, then, on the 1892's, and say one-half gallon on the 1893's, which had only passed into the regauge period the five months prior to June 30, the taxable gallons of further allowance would have amounted to but 221,558, or, in taxes, to $244,042.

If we carry the illustration to the present time, and assume that an equal quantity will be withdrawn during the present fiscal year of these ages, or distillations, they having been in bond a year longer, and assuming also the full allowance of 3 gallons on the '92's, and 1½ on the '93's, the quantity in gallons is but apparently 857,098, and in tax $590,805.

This illustration covers the product of the entire country; of which there was in bond June 30, 1897, 137,130,270 original taxable gallons. So that, taken at its highest figure, against an income of between eighty-five and ninety millions of dollars which this interest will yield to the Treasury this year—i. e., fiscal year—the comparatively insignificant sum of $590,805 would be the apparent but not actual decrease. If the withdrawals were tabulated by actual periods of withdrawal monthly, instead of applying them approximately as of one date by entire years, it would not be two-thirds of the amount named; probably even less.

It is not, however, from the point of view of the mere dollars and cents which this tax on outage after the fourth year costs us that we propose to speak of this measure, but, first, from the standpoint of the manifest injustice of this tax upon an article that does not exist; that has disappeared through natural processes, and, as the statute expresses it, "without the fault or negligence of the distiller or owner thereof." The distiller nor owner, nor anyone else, derives the slightest benefit from the vanished spirits. It does not go into consumption any more than the 9 gallons allowed for loss arising from the same causes, evaporation and soakage, during the first four years. It is simply a tax upon nothing, an exaction, from an interest that does so much, that has no foundation in common justice.

Secondly, if merely compelling us to pay this penalty for a privilege dearly bought, as I will show a little further along, was all that was involved in the question, used as we are to being taxed right and left, there would, perhaps, be no serious objection—we would grin and bear it as we do other exactions, and be thankful it was no worse—but its effects otherwise, by affecting the value and cost to the merchant investing in this class of property, are of the most pernicious character.

Independently of the tax itself on the vanished spirits after the fourth year, it operates to depreciate the value of the goods to which it applies, until the loss sustained in this direction amounts to many times the actual sum of the unjust penalty imposed. This constitutes the real injury to us, and as one illustration concerning this point will answer for all, and there are many that might be stated, I may mention that it is not at all unusual, in fact it is quite common in consequence, to see offered, quoted, and sold a 4-year-old whisky at much less figures than a 3 or 4 year old of the same brand.

This is not because the older are worth less intrinsically, nor because they cost less to produce and carry, but simply and alone because the older goods, being subjected to this penalty, are avoided for that reason by the buyer. The result is that practical confiscation ensues, necessitating a sacrifice to dispose of them and entailing an actual loss upon the unfortunate owner, growing greater every year.

To illustrate briefly what I mean by confiscation of value of the merchant's holdings in bond through the operation of this penalty: The assumed withdrawals of 1892 and 1893 for the fiscal year I have stated as 4,025,058 and 8,777,270 gallons, respectively; the vacuum tax or tax on evaporation after the fourth year as approximately $590,805, equivalent to about 4.8 cents a gallon on the withdrawals of these ages. There were remaining in bond June 30, 1897, of these ages 41,513,023 gallons, and deducting the withdrawals for this year would leave next June about twenty-eight and three-fourths million gallons, or approximately to-day about 28,000,000 of gallons of 1892 and 1893 distillations in bond.

The commercial depreciation by reason of this pending tax on these goods it is no exaggeration to estimate anywhere from 10 to 35 cents per gallon on their actual cost to the owner, taking as the basis of this cost original contract price, interest, and insurance from 1892 and 1893 to date. At 20 cents per gallon, which is a fair average, the lowest loss by depreciation amounts to $5,600,000. So that to bring slightly over half a million into the Treasury a direct and positive destruction in value of nearly twelve times the amount is inflicted upon the trade in respect to these two ages of whiskies alone.

This depreciation of older ages affects, necessarily, all others by making the purchase and carriage of bonded holdings not only undesirable, but to a large degree profitless. The total loss by depreciation to the distillers, merchant owners, and bank holders of the warehouse receipts for whiskies in bond of all ages can scarcely be estimated at less than $10,000,000.

Up to three or four years ago, and when there was no vacuum tax such as is now exacted, the principal business of nearly every merchant in the trade was in these bonded holdings. They were profitable investments. They had a value in bank as collateral second only to Government bonds and other undoubted securities. Both of these conditions or elements have disappeared through the operation of this penalty.

The forty-one millions of 1892 and 1893 whiskies in bond June 30, 1897, represented in round numbers something over 900,000 barrels. I venture the assertion that two-thirds of the warehouse receipts covering them are to-day held by banks and financial institutions which they have been carrying for five or six years. They would gladly sell them if they could; the owners are doing all they can to lift them and pay off their loans, and but for the very thing I am discussing, this pernicious and wholly unnecessary tax, they would sell perhaps at no greater price than the current quotations of this date, but they would find a market, they would be withdrawn for consumption more rapidly, and the depreciation increasing each year as the penalty accumulates would cease.

There is no more reason why this tax upon what disappears after the fourth year should be levied and enforced upon this interest, from which so great revenue is derived, than for the outrage accruing prior to the end of the fourth year. Through its application and exaction the eight-year bonded period has become, instead of the benefit which it was supposed to be, an injurious act of intended kindness; much as if we had thanked you for a favor and then received a sound kick for accepting it.

We do not regret your having given us the privilege of keeping our fine whiskies in bond eight years—please don't misunderstand us as to that—but let it be borne in mind that when an indulgent Congress, in August, 1894, granted the relief from forced tax payments then maturing, and which, on account of the conditions affecting the whole country—when the impossible, through no fault of ours, confronted us, and the money to meet maturing obligations could not be had upon any terms, scarcely; when, I repeat, Congress granted us relief by extending the period from three to eight years, it slapped on at the same time an increase of the tax rate of 22 per cent, and that, too, under the guise of a bill that declared its purpose to be "to reduce taxation."

This increase of 20 cents in the rate of tax netted the United States Treasury from this interest in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, the handsome sum of $13,994,046. If wringing this enormous sum from the merchants engaged in lawful trade in the manufacture and sale of distilled spirits did not in like proportion increase the revenue from this branch of taxation, compared with the receipts under the 90-cent tax, it was only because the higher tax gave greater stimulus to unlawful production, and all but paralyzed those who have been and are yet true to the Government, meeting their obligations honestly, a condition from which they have not yet recovered.

The measure before you, and which we are here to request your favorable action upon, was not conceived for the mere purpose of avoiding any taxes that we should justly be called upon to pay. The insignificant sum involved, or if it was double, is not in itself what we ask relief from, but from the effects of it, which, as I have briefly, and in a few words as possible, endeavored to point out, are destroying the value of our property many times more in amount.

We do not aim in this measure to abate one dollar of revenue which, fairly and honestly considered, the Government is justly entitled to receive or exact from us.

In practical effect, we assert that it will not reduce your revenues, but will increase them, immediately and permanently, by making these older and aged stocks more available, cheaper to the extent of the abatement of the penalty, and more in demand. It will undoubtedly increase your income by stimulating the bottling-in-bond feature of the business, now retarded by the increased cost put upon the age of goods which the bottling-in-bond law—one of the best ever enacted in the interest of the trade and public—requires to be used, four-year and older distillations.

In conclusion, we take the simple ground upon this subject that it would be equally as equitable and as just in principle if this Congress were to utterly abolish all allowances from the day of manufacture and tax us accordingly as it is to maintain the penalty of taxing us upon the loss after the fourth year.

I want, however, to call the attention of the House to the fact that not only the whisky men and distillers are interested in this bill, but that it affects a great many other interests. The tables in the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue show that the quantity of grain used for the purpose of the production of spirits for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, was 13,131,891 bushels, which shows a decrease of 5,498,727 bushels from the quantity used in the preceding fiscal year, which was 18,630,618 bushels, and is 8,240,173 bushels less than the average amount used for that purpose during the last ten years.

Now stop and think what that means. A falling off in the consumption of five and a half millions of bushels of grain used in the manufacture of this whisky! It affects the farmer as well as the whisky man. It cuts down the business of the great malting houses. It injures the great cooperage works of the country that make the casks, barrels, and hogsheads in which this whisky is put. It reaches the hundreds and thousands of employees about the warehouses of the Government.

A falling off in the manufacture not only makes much less work for the distiller and his hands by the closing down of the distillery, throwing his men out of work, but it affects the sale of the grain of the American farmer; it affects the employment of men about the warehouse and the men who handle the whisky, and it affects the interest of the insurance companies that insure it, as well as of the banks that make advances of credit on the whisky in bond to the distiller.

To show how seriously both the farming and the whisky interests have been affected, largely due to this cause, I desire to call attention to the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1897, page 77, in which he says:

The quantity of grain used for the production of spirits for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1897 (13,131,891 bushels), shows a decrease of 5,498,727 bushels from the quantity used in the preceding fiscal year (18,630,618 bushels), and is 8,240,173 bushels less than the average (21,872,034 bushels) for the last ten years.

The number of gallons of spirits produced from grain during the year (59,154,877) shows a decrease of 23,301,276 gallons from the product of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1896 (82,456,153 gallons), and is 33,300,522 gallons less than the average product (92,455,399 gallons) for the last ten years.

How enormously the fine whisky interests have been affected may be gathered from the following statistics for the State of Kentucky alone, which are simply taken as an illustration, as it is the great fine Bourbon whisky State.

The production of whisky in the State of Kentucky for the year ending—

Fiscal year ending June 30—	Quantity.	Fiscal year ending June 30—	Quantity.
	Gallons.		Gallons.
1890.....	36,000,000	1894.....	20,000,000
1891.....	36,000,000	1895.....	20,000,000
1892.....	37,000,000	1896.....	19,000,000
1893.....	46,000,000	1897.....	7,000,000
Total.....	155,000,000	Total.....	66,000,000

Showing a falling off of nearly 90,000,000 of gallons of production in the last period of four years from the amount produced in the four years immediately preceding. This at $1.10 a gallon means a loss of income to the Government of nearly $100,000,000.

The effect of the present law is to discriminate against all whisky more than 4 years old by attaching a penalty in the shape of taxation on the evaporation after the fourth year.

This is just contrary to what you would think should be done, because the law certainly ought to encourage the production and aging of those whiskies which are not put on the market until they are so thoroughly matured that they are best adapted for medicinal purposes and least injurious when taken as a beverage. The law as it now stands practically says to the distiller, "The greener you put the whisky on the market, the less we will tax you; but if you keep your whiskies in bond until they are finely matured and best adapted for beverage or medicinal purposes, we will attach a penalty in the form of taxation on the evaporation after the fourth year."

It certainly must have been in the minds of the framers of the original bill to encourage the distiller to keep in his bonded warehouses the higher grades of whisky until they were fully matured, otherwise the eight-year bonded period would not have been granted; but the effect of the law is just the contrary. Now, by reason of this fact, whisky which is in bonded warehouses, more than 4 years old, becomes less valuable from year to year, because it is subject to a tax on evaporation, which is constantly going on, while the younger whisky is not subject to this tax.

The destruction of values on whisky more than four years old, therefore, goes on steadily, and this lowering of values on the older whiskies naturally tends to lower the values of the younger whiskies in proportion, so that there is constantly an undermining of values by reason of the law, which allows evaporation on one kind of whisky and collects tax on the evaporation of the other kind. In other words, the purchaser of whisky in bond more than four years old is simply "going it blind" and taking his chances.

As a result of this uncertainty, the fine whiskies distilled in 1893 and 1893, which have consequently been in bond five or six years, are held out of the market, whilst the newer whiskies are forced into consumption.

One of the beneficial effects which was expected to be derived from the bottling bill which passed this House a year ago, namely, the bottling in bond of whiskies of matured age, is lost by reason of this unfair discrimination, as the dealers can not afford to bottle 1892 and 1893 whiskies in bond on account of the increased cost, due to the tax on the evaporation after the fourth year.

The additional cost of tax-paying those whiskies older than four years compels the dealer, after they are taken out of bond, to adulterate and reduce the whiskies in proof in order to cheapen them, the result being that what the Government is supposed to gain by taxing evaporation after the fourth year it loses by only getting revenue on a consumption on the basis of 60 or 70 per cent proof.

The internal-revenue laws permit whisky to be reduced in proof to any per cent desired after it has been tax-paid. The Government charges tax on the basis of 100 proof, so, if the whisky is reduced to 70 proof by the addition of water, the Government only collects tax on 70 per cent of $1.10, equivalent to, say, 77 cents per gallon on the amount actually consumed.

Another serious result of this discrepancy in the rate of tax has been the almost complete failure of value of the securities in the shape of whisky certificates held by banks and trust and investment companies which advanced to distillers large sums of money on whisky when it went into bond and, after paying storage charges and insurance, find themselves unable to pay the tax at the increased scale which I have shown above without losing more than the amount which they have advanced; and the result will be that, unless some relief is given, the Government will have to forfeit this whisky and sell it for what it will bring to get a portion of the tax assessment. This will result in immediate losses to the holders of whisky certificates and in a very great loss to the revenue of the Government.

But a more serious condition exists. The whisky men find, when it comes time to pay the tax to take it out of bond, that they can not put it on the market without a loss to themselves after paying the tax, and so they withdraw it for export. Under the law as it now stands they can send the whisky abroad and store it in warehouses until they find a market for it, and then bring it back, and when they bring it back pay the tax only on what comes into the country and not upon what went out. What is the result?

The distillers can thus secure by exportation the relief which is refused them by the existing law, because the Government recognizes the correctness of the principle of taxation on what is in the barrel by permitting the distiller to export his whisky at the end of four years and bring it back any time, whether it be one, two, three, four, five, or any number of years, and then be tax-paid at $1.10 on what the barrel actually contains at the time it is brought back to this country.

There is a difference of $6.25 per barrel in favor of exporting the whisky and storing it abroad for the second term of four years, rather than leaving it on storage in American warehouses for this second term of four years. This bill will forever prevent any exportation of whisky for storage purposes by destroying all the profit in the transaction; but many of the largest owners of whisky have already exported large quantities of 4-year-old and 5-year-old whiskies to foreign ports, especially Bremen and Hamburg.

This whisky is carried in foreign vessels; the insurance on it while abroad is paid to foreign insurance companies; the storage is paid to foreign warehouses, and the cost of taking care of it to foreign labor; while the State, county, and local taxes are lost at the same time the Government is losing the tax on the evaporation which the owner of the whisky saves while the whisky is abroad, because upon its return it is regauged and the tax paid only on what he brings back, and not on what he shipped.

Mr. EVANS. I will yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. BROMWELL. As I said, this whisky goes abroad in foreign vessels, it is stored in foreign warehouses, it is insured by foreign insurance companies. As a result of that, this country loses this tax just as it would under the outage bill. It loses the tax on the evaporation, because a tax is only paid on what is left in the barrel.

In the meantime the American money of the American distillers has gone to increase the profits of the foreign steamship companies; it has gone from the American warehouses to pay foreign warehouses for storage; it has gone to the warehouses of Bremen and other points in Europe, instead of remaining in those of your State and mine, and the insurance on the whisky, which should have been paid to American companies, is paid to companies in foreign countries.

Mr. SHUFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. I will.

Mr. SHUFORD. Do I understand that this whisky, after it has been in the bonded warehouse for a full term of eight years, can be taken out and sent abroad?

Mr. BROMWELL. No; at the end of eight years it has to be taken out and the tax paid. I am referring to that which is taken out at the end of four years. The outage is allowed up to the end of four years. At the end of four years, inasmuch as they can get no more outage, the owners, in order to age their whiskies without this burden, take the whisky out of the warehouses of this country and send it abroad for storage in foreign warehouses, and they can keep it there five, ten, twenty, or a hundred years, and then pay the tax only upon what comes back.

Mr. SHUFORD. They are not allowed to take it out at the end of eight years and send it abroad?

Mr. BROMWELL. No. They must pay the tax and take it out of bond at the end of the eight years, but may export it at any time before the expiration of the eight years. But outage is only allowed up to four years, and it is thus to their interest to export it at the end of the fourth year.

The following illustration, submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means by Mr. George W. Harris, vice-president of the Kentucky Distillers' Association, and undoubtedly one of the best posted men on this subject in the United States, clearly shows that there is such a profit to the distiller or owner of bonded whisky in sending it abroad after the fourth year as would ultimately result in almost the entire product of four or more years old whisky being thus exported.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. Is one of the objects of this bill to increase the manufacture and consumption of whisky in this country?

Mr. BROMWELL. Not at all.

Mr. SIMS. How does it affect the grain crop or the grain dealer?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, in being recognized by the Chair for a silver speech, some one may be saying to himself, Of course he is for silver, because his State produces silver.

I want to emphasize the fact that the State of Colorado to-day produces more gold than silver. In 1897 the gold product of that State was $20,000,000 and the silver product $12,000,000 commercial value, or $24,000,000 coinage value. From the standpoint of production, the people of the State of Colorado are more disinterested than the people of any other State in the Union. As our production of gold and silver in coinage value is nearly equal, you can readily see that it is as much to the interest of the people of that State to have gold monometallism, which causes the appreciation of gold, as it would be to have the free coinage of silver, which would elevate the price of that metal. But the interest of the people in the other States of this Union is not so equally poised. In many of the States the interest of the people is all one way, for the reason that they principally raise farm products that must be sold for and measured by gold.

If gold were simply a commodity like iron or copper, its increase in value would be of very little consequence. If iron and copper increase in value, it will make those who want to purchase an iron or copper article pay a little more for it than before the increase, but that is the only way in which it will affect the people. So if gold were simply a commodity, it would affect the people only when they wanted to buy a gold article, such as a watch, a charm, or a bracelet.

Mr. Chairman, the reason the increase of the value of gold is so important to every man and woman in the world is because when you adopt the gold standard you make gold the measure of everything purchasable that exists in the world. If gold increases in value, it means that its purchasing power becomes greater; that means that you can buy more products and property with a given quantity of gold than before its increase, and that means that the people who own all of the products and property must yield up more of those products and property in order to obtain the dollar of that standard. That means that they must sell at a less price.

No person can comprehend the question of the free coinage of silver unless he understands the distinctions that exist between moneys. There are two kinds of money in the world:

First, primary money.

Second, credit money.

Primary money is the money of ultimate payment or ultimate redemption. Under the gold standard gold alone becomes the primary money, because the whole monetary system is founded upon the gold valuation. Under a bimetallic system gold and silver become the standard or primary money, because payment can be made in either. Of course gold certificates are equivalent to primary money, as gold is on deposit to redeem them.

Credit money is that which is issued upon the general credit of the Government or of the bank issuing the same. It is really not money at all; it is simply a promise to pay standard money. Examine one of the United States notes commonly called greenbacks and you will notice that it reads as follows: "The United States promises to pay to bearer five dollars." Five dollars in what? In the coin that the Government adopts as its standard of value. You can readily see, therefore, how important it is to the people of the world that the standard money, or money of ultimate payment, should not increase in value. All of the credit money of the world becomes redeemable under a gold standard in gold, and as gold increases in value, all of this credit money also increases in value, because it is redeemable in gold.

Thereupon all of the bonds issued by the various gold-standard nations of the world, as well as those issued by States, counties, and municipal corporations therein, by reason of the redemption of their paper money in gold became payable in that metal, or the equivalent thereof, and are directly affected by the increase in the value of gold. So also all the promissory notes that are executed by individuals, upon the adoption of the gold standard, become payable in gold or in that money which is redeemable in gold. Consequently, as gold increases in value, that is, in purchasing power, it increases the value or purchasing power of every bond, promissory note, and other security payable in money in such gold-standard country. It can readily be seen, therefore, what a terrible injustice an increase in the value of gold becomes to the man who owes money.

These moneys have different functions. All moneys act as a circulating medium. All moneys of our Government perform that function well. But the far more important function of money is its measure of values, and it is only primary money that acts to any considerable extent as the measure of values. While the increase of credit money would tend to elevate prices, yet, without an increase in the gold base, that tendency would be largely overcome by the greater demand made thereby upon gold with which to redeem such paper money. It must be remembered that the value of basic money is fixed by the world's demand for the metal composing the same. An increase in basic money not only enlarges the circulating medium to the extent of the increase, but permits the building thereon of a large quantity of credit money. Redemption money can support at least three times its amount in credit money; hence an addition in basic money is so important in relieving the strain on gold and hence in elevating prices.

Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss three propositions to-day.

First. That theoretically the demonetization of silver must produce a great increase in the value of gold.

Second. That in point of fact, in point of history, the demonetization of silver by the various nations of the world has greatly increased the value of gold; and Third. That the United States has the power to establish the parity of value between the metals at the ratio of 16 to 1.

Upon the first proposition, namely, that in point of theory the demonetization of silver would greatly increase the value of gold, I want to assume, for the purpose of more clearly showing the operation of the theory, that the world is now upon a bimetallic standard of value. The total amount of gold and silver coin in the world is now, and at almost all stages of the world's history has been, about equal. There is to-day, according to the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $4,859,600,000 of gold coin, and $4,268,300,000 of silver coin in the world.

Now, what effect would the demonetization of one of these metals have upon the value of the other? When by legislation you strike down one of these metals as primary money, you must of necessity shift onto the other all of the burdens of this monetary system, and of the bonds, promissory notes, and other securities. In other words, all the burdens of commerce and credit borne by both metals as primary money by demonetization of one become transferred to the other metal alone. As the amount of these metals for monetary uses is about equal, it must of necessity double the burden upon that metal. Doubling the burden upon a metal means that you have doubled the demand for that metal.

Doubling the demand for a metal means what? You understand the principle of supply and demand. You know that if you increase the demand, you increase the value of that which you demand. Consequently doubling the demand for a metal must of necessity double its value. Therefore if by legislation the nations of the world should strike down silver as primary money, they would thereby double the burden upon gold, double the demand for gold, and double the value of gold.

Doubling the value of gold means the dividing by half the gold prices of all property. If you double the length of the foot rule, you cut half in two everything measured by that rule. The man who is now 6 feet in height becomes only 3 feet by that measurement. It is therefore fatal to all people who must sell commodities and property in order to obtain money with which to pay debts, taxes, and other fixed charges. It means the mortgage will take the farm. Is it any wonder, then, that people should condemn that legislation which in time produces such fatal effects upon the value of property?

The great political economist, John Stuart Mill, has well said:

The value of money, other things being the same, varies inversely as its quantity, every increase of quantity lowering the value and every diminution raising it in a ratio exactly equivalent.

Ricardo has also said:

That commodities rise or fall in proportion to the increase or diminution of money I assume as a fact that is incontrovertible.

Since barter to any considerable extent no longer exists, the demand for money is equal to the total sum of the demands for all commodities and property. In fact, they are reciprocally the supply and demand of each other. Hence prices must vary inversely just as much by the destruction of one-half of all money as they would by the destruction of one-half of all commodities. It must not be forgotten that the ratio of credits to money is about 15 to 1 and of commodity and property values about 30 to 1; therefore the contraction of every dollar in money means the loss of $15 in credits and $30 in property values.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that gold has not actually doubled in value. And why? Because all of the nations of the world have not yet demonetized silver, and consequently gold is not bearing all of the burdens of primary money which were formerly borne in the world by both gold and silver. There are still some nations in the world that relieve the strain on gold by treating silver as primary money, and some by also holding their mints open to the free coinage of silver. The silver-standard nations are Mexico, China, Siam, Straits Settlements, Central American States, most of the South American States, Persia, Tripoli, and Japan, constituting about one-fourth of the nations of the world in commercial importance.

The earth is then divided into gold-standard nations, which transact about three-fourths of the world's commerce, and silver-standard countries, which transact about one-fourth of the business thereof, which, according to every principle of supply and demand, should, theoretically, increase the value of gold a very great amount.

I am aware that this increase in the value of gold by reason of the shifting of burdens that were formerly borne by both gold and silver onto gold alone did not take place in a short interval of time. And why? Because silver was demonetized gradually. It was one nation after another, at intervals of years, that transferred to gold the burdens that were formerly borne by both, and consequently the appreciation in the value of gold has been gradual, just as these increased burdens have by the nations been transferred to gold.

The coinage on government account by gold-standard nations, if the policy of such governments is to offer to redeem it in gold, does not relieve the strain on gold. The silver coin then becomes simply a promise to pay gold. The coinage of silver in that manner makes that many more obligations redeemable in gold, and hence makes that much more burden that gold, as the money of ultimate payment, must bear. Under those circumstances the coinage of silver on government account, instead of relieving the strain on gold, actually increases the demand for it, and consequently the value thereof.

Mr. Chairman, we all recognize this principle of supply and demand when it is applied to the commodities. Then why should we not recognize it when applied to gold and silver? There existed for centuries, at least in some nations, the right of any person to take gold and silver bullion to the mint or mill of the government and have it coined into legal-tender money. Would not the taking away of that right as to one metal affect not only its value but also that of the other?

Suppose the nations of the world were to conclude, from a scientific inquiry, that it was unhealthy to eat wheat bread, and that as a sanitary measure they should pass laws that millers should no longer grind wheat. If that law could be enforced, what effect would it have upon the price of wheat? Everyone knows that the minute that law took effect wheat would sink lower and lower in value until it reached a price equal to what it would be worth to feed to animals. Why? Because the very demand for which wheat had been raised was destroyed, and consequently its value must be fixed by the next thing for which it is demanded. What effect would this same law have upon the price of corn? You know that the minute that law took effect corn would begin to rise rapidly and go higher and higher in price until it reached double its former value. Why? Because the enormous demand which existed for wheat and corn had been transferred to corn alone; and as the demand for corn had been doubled, it must of necessity double the value thereof. Gold and silver are metals that are subject to the same law of supply and demand, and consequently must yield in price as the demand is removed from one and shifted to the other.

HAS THE INCREASE OF GOLD MONEY EQUALED THE QUANTITY OF SILVER MONEY DEMONETIZED?

Our friends upon the gold side of this question say, however, that as silver has been demonetized gradually, the burdens that have been shifted onto gold gradually have been relieved by the annual production of gold which has continually caused an addition to the gold basic money of the world. The difficulty with that statement is that the annual production of gold has been so small compared to the total stock and the part that has gone into coinage so little that it has not kept pace even with the commerce and credit of the world.

Besides, the abrasion of the total stock of gold coin has annually been very great. In the Statistician and Economist of 1897 and 1898, at page 602, it is stated that on $1,000,000 shipped from New York to Liverpool the loss by abrasion was $256. If so great a loss to coins securely packed takes place from a single trip, what must be the loss from the handling of the pieces in pocket and in trade?

It was estimated several years ago by Mr. Robert Giffen, the president of the Statistical Society of London, and a gold-standard advocate, that not one dollar of the gold product of the world went into coins. He did not mean by that that there was no coinage, but that the melting pot of the goldsmith transformed as many coins into the arts as there was gold coined.

Prof. C. L. Fawcett, a gold monometallist and an eminent statistician, stated that of the world's product of 1892, which was $146,000,000, $110,000,000 of it was consumed in the arts.

Sir Lyon Playfair, a gold monometallist and member of the British Parliament, who has made a study of the production of gold and silver, has declared that 75 per cent of the gold product of the world is consumed in the arts.

You can readily see that there is great force in these estimates. Twenty-five years ago the number of gold watches, chains, and charms that were worn in a town of, say, 1,500 population could have been counted on the fingers of your hands, while now they are almost counted by the hundreds. The number of gold medals that were issued twenty-five years ago was a very small fraction of those which are now awarded each year.

The amount of gold used in dentistry twenty-five years ago was almost infinitesimal compared to the amount used to-day, and the amount of gold leaf used in gilding in signs and in decorations has been multiplied in recent years. When you look across the Capitol Grounds and see that the great dome of the Library building is covered with gold leaf, and that there are many other buildings in the United States that are decorated in the same manner, you can easily imagine how vast in recent years has been the use of gold in the arts. Senator John Sherman on July 11, 1876, estimated that the total amount of gold money in the world at that time was $3,500,000,000. Secretary Gage now estimates that the total amount of gold coin in the world is about $4,350,000,000. Thus we see that in twenty-two years, by the most active attempts of all governments to produce gold coin, there has been added to the gold money of the world only $850,000,000, or about $39,000,000 a year.

The total amount of gold produced in these twenty-two years was $2,765,688,100, and thus it can be seen that only about 30 per cent of the gold product has gone into coin. But even if we were to estimate that 30 per cent of the annual product of gold would go into coin, it would only make an addition to the basic money of the world, according to the large production of 1896, of only $60,000,000 a year; and the share which the United States would be entitled to according to its commercial importance would not exceed $20,000,000 a year. Yet we know that the demand which this Government made upon gold during the last two years of the Cleveland Administration was enormous compared even to the total amount of gold that goes into gold coin. Thus it became necessary during those two years, in order to maintain the gold reserve of the Treasury, to issue bonds for the purchase of gold to the extent of $262,000,000, and hence it is plain that if it is necessary that this Government should demand $130,000,000 a year, how greatly inadequate is $60,000,000 a year for the total supply of all the nations of the world.

Mr. Chairman, it is true that gold is now coming to this country in payment of the wheat and other products we have shipped to Europe, which is relieving the strain on gold in this country; but it is causing a corresponding famine in gold in Europe. Only the other day the Bank of England raised the rate of discount for gold shipment to 4 per cent, and as the value of so many of our products is fixed by the London market, a famine in gold there is almost as disastrous to us as it is here.

When you adopt a single gold standard, you are thereby tying yourself to a metal the production of which does not keep pace with the commerce of the world; and consequently the continually increasing demands that are made upon gold must increase its value and must mean that everything that gold will buy must go lower and lower in price. Therefore, it is no answer to the proposition that gold should theoretically increase in value by reason of the shifting of the burdens which were formerly borne by both gold and silver upon gold alone, to say that there has been gold added each year to the money of the world, when in truth and in fact that addition of gold has not kept pace with the increasing commerce of the world.

HAVE BANK CHECKS OVIATED THE NECESSITY FOR MORE MONEY?

Mr. Chairman, the gold-standard advocates further contend that in the last twenty-five years banking facilities have increased so much and bank checks so largely taken the place of a circulating medium that we no longer need as much money as formerly, and consequently that the strain on gold has been very much diminished. At the first statement of the proposition one is inclined to believe that there is considerable truth in the contention, because of the enormous development that has been made in recent years in so many industries of this nation. But, sir, upon a close examination it will be discovered that there is very little if anything in the proposition.

If depositors could have checks paid by a bank without having money to their credit to cover the same, then, of course, there would be great force in the argument. But when you realize that the use of the check simply obviates the necessity of the depositor going to the bank, drawing the money which he has on deposit, and paying it over to his creditor, one realizes that it is not so much credit as cash that is the foundation of the transaction. It is true that banks do not keep in their vaults all the money that is deposited with them, but they are required to have a very large reserve, which in the past few years has been between 30 and 50 per cent of their deposits. But it is also true that the checks that are outstanding at any time never equal the amounts held by the banks as reserves. Hence the use of the check can not lessen to any considerable extent the necessity for money.

IS A GREATER PROPORTION OF BUSINESS DONE BY CHECKS NOW THAN FORMERLY?

The contention that so much more business is now done by checks and credits than was done when silver was demonetized is not well founded. There is no better test of the amount of the business which is done by checks in one period over another than is ascertained from the clearing-house reports of such a city as New York, which for the past thirty years has had about the same number of banks. I hold in my hand a statement showing the clearings of the New York clearing house from 1869 to January 1, 1898, which I ask to have incorporated as a part of my remarks.

* The capital is for various dates, the amounts at a uniform date in each year not being obtainable.

From this tabulated list it is shown, surprising as the statement may appear, that the clearings for the year 1896 were less than the clearing for the year 1869, 1872, or 1873. The clearings for the year 1896 being $29,350,594,894, while those for the year 1869 were $37,407,028,967; those for 1872 $33,844,369,568, and those for the year 1873 $35,461,053,826. Even the clearings for 1897, the year of the so-called restored confidence, were less than those of the early years to which I have referred. The clearings for the year 1897 being $31,337,760,248.

These figures show conclusively that notwithstanding the enormous increase in the business of New York City, not as much of it is transacted by checks as formerly.

Mr. Chairman, it is often asserted by the single gold standard advocates that the use of checks in the last few years has become so universal that now 95 per cent of the business of the United States is done by checks. That proposition also I most emphatically deny. This same statement of the clearings of the New York Clearing House shows that it takes 6 per cent in cash to pay the balances among banks, and it must be plain and clear to anyone that if it takes 6 per cent in money to settle balances among institutions which are created for the purpose of saving cash transactions, how great must be the per cent of cash in the ordinary retail transactions in city and country. This same statement shows that it requires more money now to settle balances among the banks of New York City than it did twenty-five years ago; that in 1869, 1872, and 1878 it took 3, 4.2, and 4.1 per cent in money, while in 1895, 1896, and 1897 it took 6.7, 6.2, and 6 per cent in money to settle balances.

The necessity for more money now than formerly with which to transact business is very apparent. Twenty-five years ago the farmer ran his bill for all he needed at the general merchandise store and made his settlement once a year, and that settlement often, if not generally, was in the products of his farm. Such a thing as a strictly cash house was almost unknown in those days. To-day there are vast numbers of strictly cash houses, and where in other business houses credit is obtained, the bills must be paid every thirty days instead of at the end of the year. It seems to me that the fallacy of this claim should be settled forever by the admission of the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. Eckels, who can not be said to favor the silver question in any particular, on page 381 of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1894. That statement shows that from returns made by national banks all over the United States 41.1 per cent of the deposits of retail commercial houses is in money. How much greater, then, must be the per cent of moneyed transactions with savings banks and among the people!

Consequently the contention that the strain on gold caused by the demonetization of silver has been relieved by decreasing the necessity for money through banking facilities and the use of checks is not well founded.

President McKinley, in a speech at Toledo, Ohio, on February 12, 1891, clearly expressed the operation of the theory of the demonetization of silver in the following language:

During all of Grover Cleveland's years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of our precious metals, one of our own products, discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored even before his inauguration to office to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards and to the end of his Administration persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and to demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce, and therefore dear. He would have increased the value of money and diminished the value of everything else—money the master, everything else the servant. He was not thinking of "the poor" then. He had left "their side." He was not standing forth in their defense. Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money. The sponsor and promoter of these professing to stand guard over the welfare of the poor and lowly! Was there ever more inconsistency or reckless assumption?

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that my first proposition—namely, that in point of theory the demonetization of silver, which transfers the burdens borne by both gold and silver to gold alone as redemption money, must greatly increase the value of gold—is conclusively proven.

THE SECOND PROPOSITION IS THAT IN POINT OF FACT, BY REASON OF THE DEMONETIZATION OF SILVER, GOLD HAS GREATLY INCREASED IN VALUE.

The increase in the value of gold can not be estimated in dollars and cents, because it is the unit of measurement. This increase in value can only be estimated by its increased purchasing power. What we mean by increased purchasing power is that it buys more of commodities and property. That means that the owner of commodities and property must yield up more of them in order to obtain a given quantity of money upon the gold valuation than before the increase in value of gold, and that means he must sell at a less price.

Consequently the only way it is possible to determine whether gold has increased in value is to ascertain whether it will buy more of products and property than formerly; that is, whether products and property have decreased in price.

In order to satisfactorily prove a fact it is important that we should adopt an authority that can not be questioned; the proof must be something that was not framed with reference to the silver question and something that deals with facts that can not be denied.

Mr. August Sauerbeck, of London, an eminent statistician, conceived the idea that it would be an important piece of information to the world if the prices of commodities were kept from day to day and from year to year. He selected forty-five of the principal commodities* that are used by man, which he termed staple commodities, such as wheat, rye, corn, and barley; such as beef, pork, and mutton, cotton and wool, and in the metals such as iron and copper. These comprise 80 per cent of the total marketed commodities of the world.

He selected those which in his judgment would be freer from

* The following are the articles upon the prices of which are founded the Sauerbeck tables: English wheat, American wheat, flour, barley, oats, maize, potatoes, rice, beef (prime), beef (middling), mutton (prime), mutton (middling), pork, bacon, butter, sugar, sugar (Java), coffee, tea, iron (pig), iron (bars), copper, tin, lead, coal, coal (average), cotton (middling), cotton (fair), flax, hemp, jute, wool, wool (English), silk, hides, leather, tallow, oil (palm), oil (olive), oil (linseed), petroleum, soda, nitrates of soda, indigo, timber (hewn and sawed).

the cheapening effects of inventions. The London market price of each of those forty-five commodities was taken for each day in the year since 1846. The London market is the best and safest from which to reckon, for the reason that it draws its supplies from the entire world. The price of commodities in that market is not affected by a drought in one country or an overproduction in another nearly as much as in the countries themselves where the drought or overproduction occurs. At the end of each year the price of each and all of those forty-five commodities was averaged and tabulated. These tables have been kept to the present time, and they are not open to the charge of being made in the interest of one side or the other of this question.

I hold in my hand the tables which I ask to insert in my remarks:

Mr. Chairman, these tables show conclusively that since the demonetization of silver the prices of these commodities have been going lower and lower each year when measured in gold. If one commodity falls in price, it is entirely proper that we should look to the supply and demand of that one commodity in order to determine the cause. When one commodity falls and the other commodities do not, you can always account for the fall by the overproduction of that one commodity. The rule of supply and demand knows no exception. But there is no such thing as a continual overproduction of one commodity year after year. There are checks in nature that prevent it. Neither can there be such a thing as an overproduction of all commodities even for one year.

Mr. Chairman, there is no overproduction of food when people are starving, nor of clothing when they are half naked. The very existence of such conditions negatives the contention. The possibility of the demand for products is perfectly enormous. For instance, the consumption of wheat in the United States for the year 1896 was 4.73 bushels per capita. The total wheat crop of the world for the year 1896 was 2,430,497,000 bushels. There are 1,500,000,000 inhabitants on the earth. If the rest of the world consumed as much as we do, there would have to be raised in order to feed them 7,170,000,000 bushels of that cereal. Taking the average American as the standard, there would be a demand for nearly three times as much as the quantity now raised.

The consumption of cotton in the United States in 1896, though a little below the average of recent years, was 18 pounds per capita. If the inhabitants of the world used cotton goods in the same proportion, there would have to be produced, in order to supply the demand, 67,500,000 bales of 400 pounds each instead of the 13,380,000 now raised by the world. In other words, if the people of the world were as well clothed as Americans, there would have to be produced nearly six times as much cotton as now. All nations desire to be as well fed and clothed as the Americans, and hence the possibility of the demand is enormous.

According to this table of Mr. Sauerbeck, we find the condition existing that ever since 1873 there has been a continual decline in the price of not only one of these commodities, but in the price of all of them. There have been some rallying points, but they are few and at long intervals. The first year after demonetization, the price of these commodities fell to 92 per cent of what they were in 1873; the next year to 86 per cent, and year after year they fell lower and lower, until in 1896 they reached the lowest level that has existed in the world for the last two hundred years. In that year they reached the low level of 54.9 per cent of what they were in 1873, showing that gold when measured in these forty-five commodities had increased 82 per cent in value.

When we see all of these commodities declining year after year, and know that it can not be on account of overproduction, had we better not turn to see whether there is not something wrong with that thing by which we measure all of these forty-five commodities? Had we better not see whether these low prices have not been caused by the fact that continually since 1873 the nations of the world have been transferring burdens from both gold and silver onto gold alone, thereby increasing the burden upon, increasing the demand for, and increasing the purchasing power of, gold?

The cause for the few slight upward turns in the prices of these commodities can be traced to the decreased demand for gold produced by the addition of silver money.

President Harrison, in December, 1890, sent a message to Congress, in which he used the following language with reference to the Sherman Act:

The increased circulation secured by the act has exerted and will continue to exert a most beneficial influence upon business and upon general values. The enlargement of our currency by the silver bill undoubtedly gave an upward tendency to trade and had a marked effect on prices; but this natural and desired effect of the silver legislation was by many erroneously attributed to the new tariff act.

Jeremiah Rusk, then Secretary of Agriculture, a little later, in his annual report, made the following statement with reference to the same act:

The recent legislation looking to the restoration of the bimetallic standard of our currency, and the consequent enhancement of the value of silver, has unquestionably had much to do with the recent advance in the price of cereals. The same cause has advanced the price of wheat in Russia and India, and in the same degree reduced their power of competition. English gold was formerly exchanged for cheap silver, and wheat purchased with the cheaper metal was sold in Great Britain for gold. Much of this advantage is lost by the appreciation of silver in those countries.

I therefore contend that there are two conditions that affect the price of commodities: First, the supply and demand of the commodity itself, and second, the supply and demand of that thing which measures all commodities—namely, the metal out of which we make standard money.

Mr. Chairman, at all periods of the world's history when there has been a diminution of the metallic money for a long series of years, it has invariably produced ruin and disaster, misery and poverty, ignorance and crime. On the other hand, when there has been an increase in the volume of primary money of the world there has always resulted enterprise and prosperity, happiness and wealth, education and civilization.

No better authorities can be cited to sustain such a statement than the historians Hume and Alison.

Mr. Hume has clearly stated the fact in the following language:

We find that in every kingdom into which money begins to flow in greater abundance than formerly everything takes a new face; labor and industry gain life; the merchant becomes more enterprising; the manufacturer becomes more diligent and skillful; even the farmer follows his plow with greater alacrity and attention.

A nation whose money decreases is, at times, weaker and more miserable than another nation which possesses no more money, but is on the increasing land. Falling prices and misery and destruction are inseparable companions. The disasters of the Dark Ages were caused by decreasing money and falling prices. With the increase of money, labor and industry gather new life.

Jacobs, in his History of the Precious Metals, records the fact that at the time of Augustus Caesar the silver and gold in the Roman Empire amounted to what is equivalent in our money to $1,640,000,000, and that at the time of the discovery of America they had dwindled to $170,000,000. These prices were the lowest in the history of the world.

Sir Archibald Alison in 1853, after the great gold discoveries in California and Australia, most eloquently expressed the same fact in the following language:

The two greatest events that have occurred in the history of mankind have been directly brought about by a contraction and, on the other hand, an expansion of the circulating medium of society.

The fall of the Roman Empire, so long ascribed, in ignorance, to slavery, egotism, and moral corruption, was in reality brought about by a decline in the silver and gold mines of Spain and Greece. And, as if Providence had intended to reveal in the clearest manner the influence of this mighty agent on human affairs, the resurrection of mankind from the ruin which those causes had produced was owing to a directly opposite set of agencies being put in operation.

Columbus led the way in the career of renovation. When he spread his sails across the Atlantic, he bore mankind and its fortunes in his bark. The annual supply of the precious metals for the use of the globe was tripled. Before a century had expired the price of every species of produce was quadrupled. The weight of debt and taxes insensibly wore off under the influence of that prodigious increase.

In the renovation of industry the relations of society were changed, the weight of feudalism cast off, the rights of man established. Among the many concurrent causes which conspired to bring about this mighty consummation the most important, though hitherto the least observed, was the discovery of Mexico and Peru.

If the circulating medium of the globe had remained stationary or declining, as it was from 1815 to 1840, from the effects of the South American revolution and English legislation, the fate which crushed Rome in ancient, and has all but crushed Great Britain in modern, times would have been that of the whole family of mankind.

All these evils have been entirely obviated and an opposite set of blessings introduced by the opening of the great treasures of nature in California and Australia.

The memorable prediction of Mr. Ernest Seyd, of London, in 1871, as to the effect of the demonetization of silver, is being verified year by year. It was as follows:

It is a great mistake to suppose that the adoption of the gold valuation by other states besides England will be beneficial. It will only lead to the destruction of the monetary equilibrium hitherto existing, and cause a fall in the value of silver, from which England's trade and the Indian silver valuation will suffer more than all other interests, grievous as the general decline of prosperity all over the world will be.

The strong doctrinism existing in England as regards the gold valuation is so blind that, when the time of depression sets in, there will be this special feature: The economic authorities of the country will refuse to listen to the cause here foreshadowed; every possible attempt will be made to prove that the decline of commerce is due to all sorts of causes and irreconcilable matters. The workman and his strikes will be the first convenient target; then speculation and overtrading will have their turn. Later on, when foreign nations, unable to pay in silver, have recourse to protection, when a number of other secondary causes develop themselves, then many would-be wise men will have the opportunity of pointing to specific reasons which in their eyes account for the falling off in every branch of trade. Many other allegations will be made totally irrelevant to the real issue, but satisfactory to the moribund tendency of financial writers. The great danger of the time will then be that, among all this confusion and strife, England's supremacy in commerce and manufactures may go backward to an extent which can not be redressed when the real cause becomes recognized and the natural remedy is applied.

These authorities ought to convince every one that not only in point of theory but in point of history every contraction of the money of the world has produced falling prices, with their inevitably fatal results.

But gold monometallists, while denying the principle of supply and demand as applied to gold and silver, nevertheless assert that the cause of the low price of these commodities is overproduction. There is kept as the forty-sixth commodity, alongside of the forty-five, the London price of silver bullion, and the table of Mr. Sauerbeck shows that the London price of silver bullion has gone down also in about the same ratio as those of the forty-five commodities.

HAS THERE BEEN AN OVERPRODUCTION OF SILVER?

Mr. Chairman, our gold friends say that the reason silver is worth only about 50 cents on the dollar is because there has been an overproduction of that metal. Let us examine into that contention, for if there has been an overproduction of silver we should acknowledge it, and if there has not been they should acknowledge it. The world's production of gold and silver is kept with more accuracy than that of any other product. The nations, knowing the importance that the precious metals are to the monetary systems of the world, have with the greatest care kept record of the annual output of each.

I hold in my hand a table of the production of gold and silver of the world from 1741 to 1896, as estimated by the Director of the Mint, which I ask to insert in my remarks.

According to that statement, there has been produced in the world of gold during those one hundred and fifty-six years $7,451,851,600.

Under the principle of supply and demand, the price of silver being but 50 cents on the dollar in gold, you would naturally expect that the world's production of silver in that time would have been nearly double that of gold, and yet when you turn to that table, which evidently was not framed in the interest of silver, we find that, instead of the amount of silver produced in those one hundred and fifty-six years being nearly twice as much as gold, it was only $7,405,687,800 coinage value.

Thus we find that during that period there was $45,000,000 less of silver produced than gold, and yet our gold friends contend that the low price of silver is due to overproduction. This table, from the Treasury Department, over which gold-standard Secretaries have for thirty years presided, should forever stamp as false any such contention of gold monometallists.

It is true that in recent years the production of silver has increased, but it must be remembered that the production of gold has also increased. For the year 1897 it is estimated by the Director of the Mint that the production of gold exceeds that of silver.

Mr. Chairman, if overproduction has not caused the fall in the gold price of silver, what has? But one other thing could have caused it, and that is the destruction of the demand for that metal produced by depriving it of the function of redemption money and of the right to be coined into full legal-tender money.

Senator Sherman, in a speech in the Senate on July 11, 1876, clearly expressed the same conclusion in the following words:

The enormous effect of the law in Germany and as a consequence the partial demonetization of silver coins, I suppose is felt by every man, woman, and child who buys or sells anything. A struggle for the possession of gold at once arose between the great nations; because anybody could see that if $3,200,000,000 of silver coin were demonetized and $3,600,000,000 of gold coin made the sole standard it would enormously add to the value of gold, and the Bank of France, the Bank of England, and the Imperial Bank of Germany at once commenced grasping for gold in whatever form. Therefore, what we have observed recently is not so much a fall of silver as it is a rise of gold, the inevitable effect of a fear of the demonetization of silver.

We often hear it asserted by gentlemen upon the floor of this House that when silver gets back in commercial importance and value to gold they will be willing to open our mints to the free coinage of silver.

How is it possible to elevate the price of a metal when you have taken from it the very demand and use for which it was designed? Gold and silver were designed by nature as money metals on account of the peculiar properties that make them so valuable for such purpose. They possessed the quality of indestructibility, by reason of which they can be melted and remelted without appreciable loss. They are very valuable compared to their bulk, and they have the additional quality of being limited in their production, which makes it impossible to inflate such a currency.

When by legislation you strike down the very demand for which these metals are mined, when you take away the very use for which they are designed, you are bound to depreciate their value just as surely as you would depreciate the price of wheat to prohibit it being ground for bread. Consequently that value can never be restored to silver unless you restore the demand which gives it that value.

HAS THERE BEEN AN OVERPRODUCTION OF WHEAT?

The gold advocates further contend that there has clearly been an overproduction of wheat; that Argentina and India have been pouring their wheat into the world's market, which has caused the price of that cereal to go down. There is another table, which was framed by a gold monometalist, J. Sterling Morton, the last Secretary of Agriculture, showing the world's production of wheat from 1891 to 1896, which I ask to incorporate in my remarks. It can not be said that table was framed in the interest of silver.

You will notice that during the whole period of six years there never was a variation of 5 per cent in the world's production of wheat in any one year over that of the preceding year, and there was not a variation from the very highest production during that period to the very lowest to exceed 10 per cent, and yet during that time wheat fell from 88.9 cents per bushel to 49.1 cents per bushel. This table, compiled from the highest authority upon such questions, should set at rest forever the claim that the low price of wheat is caused by overproduction.

The increase in the price of wheat during the past eighteen months can be traced with absolute certainty to the famine in India the shortage of crops in Europe and Australia and the war between the United States and Spain.

HAS THERE BEEN AN OVERPRODUCTION OF COTTON?

Mr. Chairman, the gold-standard advocates further contend that the low price of cotton has been caused by overproduction. It is true there has been an increase in the world's production of cotton from 6,452,000 bales of 400 pounds each in 1873, to 13,139,000 bales of the same size in 1897, but that increase did not much more than keep pace with the increased uses of cotton goods during that period, and does not account for the enormous fall in price from 18 cents per pound in 1873 to 6 cents per pound in 1897.

The following table shows the world's production of cotton for 1873, and from 1890 to 1897, taken from Circular No. 1 of the United States Agricultural Department, and for the last two years from the World Almanac:

Commercial year.	The world's cotton crop (in bales of 400 pounds each).	Per cent produced by United States.	Per cent produced by balance of world.
1873	6,452,000	66.95	33.01
1890	11,386,000	74.83	25.17
1891	12,604,000	80.40	19.31
1892	12,214,000	80.88	19.12
1893	10,531,000	75.81	24.19
1894	11,688,000	76.13	23.87
1895	12,157,000	84.50	15.50
1896	12,330,000	85	15
1897	13,139,000	82.24	17.76

The world's crop for 1890 was only 15 per cent less than that of 1895, yet the price for 1890 was 84 per cent higher than that of 1895, the average price in 1890 being 11.53 cents per pound while that in 1895 was 6.26 cents per pound. Although the crop of 1897 was less than that of 1892, 1895, and 1896, cotton in New York on December 31, 1897, and for months prior, sold at from 5½ to 5¼ cents per pound, the lowest price in the history of the world. So it appears plain that the fall in the price of cotton has not been caused by overproduction.

In the same manner you could go through each of the forty-five commodities named in the Sauerbeck tables and demonstrate as to each that there has been no overproduction. When we find that the low price of silver, wheat, and cotton was not caused by overproduction, the only thing that can have caused their low price is the increase in value of that thing which measures silver, wheat, cotton, and the other forty-three commodities, namely, gold, and that increase in value was caused by the world making increased demands upon it as primary money, to take the place of silver as it was demonetized.

HAS LABOR FALLEN IN PRICE?

Mr. Chairman, it is claimed that labor has not declined in price, and therefore the appreciation of gold is not the cause of the fall in prices. Our opponents usually take the year 1860 as the date of the comparison of wages. In the first place that date is not a fair one, because at that time nearly one-half of our nation afforded a poor market, if any, for labor, on account of the existence of slavery therein. The price of labor in the remainder of the Union was most seriously affected by the proximity thereto of the cheap labor that slavery afforded.

But the principal reason why there has not been as much reduction in wages of those actually employed as there has been in the price of commodities is because wages have been held up by all manner of human devices in the shape of trades unions and labor organizations. Labor never had a fair opportunity to compete with capital until within the last few years. But, notwithstanding these advantages, if you take into consideration the number of men out of employment, there is a far less total sum paid for labor than if all were employed at greatly reduced wages. It is absurd to say that the products of labor may fall year after year and yet not affect the price of labor.

HAVE IMPROVED PROCESSES CAUSED THE FALL IN PRICES?

The theory that the introduction of improved machinery and the lowering of transportation charges accounts for the decline in the price of commodities is erroneous. The price of a commodity is not determined by its cost; it is determined by the operation of the principle of supply and demand. If the price of a commodity were determined by its cost, it would never sell for less than cost, no matter how much the market in that line was glutted, and it would never sell for any considerable profit, no matter what scarcity existed in that product. The only influence that the cheapening of the cost of production and transportation has is to make the profit of the farmer greater instead of less, and the very desire to make more profits stimulates production and thus increases the supply, and in that way only affects prices.

These influences of cheapening the cost of production ought to operate to the advantage of the farmer instead of his loss. But even if there was some truth in the assertion that improved machinery and lower transportation charges has cheapened the price of farm products, it must be remembered that farm products, like everything else, are measured in gold and their price fixed in gold.

There can be no doubt that there have been in the past twenty years improved processes in the treatment of gold ores, in the hoisting apparatus used in mining, in the use of electricity in drilling, mining, and igniting explosives, and in the character of high explosives for blasting, which have lowered the cost of the production of that metal far more than the improved processes in farming have lowered the prices of farm products.

As a matter of fact, the great era of labor-saving machines in farming was from 1850 to 1873, and during all of that time there was a general rise in farm products. People unfamiliar with mining may think that transportation charges constitute a very small per cent of the value of the ores and hence would affect the general cost of marketing very little; but they are mistaken. The greatest yield and the most constant yield is from the mines that net a very small sum per ton over the cost of mining and shipping to the smelter; and freight charges often determine whether a mine can be worked at all. When we know that there are thousands of tons of ore from the Rocky Mountain regions smelted in Chicago, one may realize that the haul is not a short one.

If the cheapening of the cost of raising products and of mining gold ores had been the same, and had controlled prices, the fall in each being the same, there should have been no fall at all when measured by each other. But the cheapening of the cost of raising and marketing farm products in the past twenty years having been less than the cheapening of the cost of mining and marketing gold ores, we are led to the inevitable conclusion that relatively there should have been a rise in farm products measured in gold, instead of a fall. We therefore conclude that this theory of the cost of production controlling prices is erroneous; that it is the great principle of supply and demand that controls the price of gold as well as that of farm products; that the great fall in the gold price of products is due to the fact that the demand for gold has so enormously increased; that having to bear all the burdens of primary money that both gold and silver bore, gold must have increased in value and therefore decreased the price of every product measured by that metal.

DOES LOWER INTEREST SHOW THAT MONEY HAS NOT INCREASED IN VALUE?

Our opponents, in order to show that gold has not appreciated in value, point to the fact that the rate of interest on money is less now than when silver was demonetized. In that contention they confuse the idea of a sale of money with that of a lending of money. The agreement to pay interest does not contemplate the purchase of money, but the return of the same thing borrowed. The value of money is to be determined by its purchasing power, not by its interest-getting power. The demand for the purchase of money is founded upon entirely different conditions from the demand for the loan of money. In fact, when the purchasing power is greatest the lending power is least.

The increasing of the purchasing power of money is "falling prices" of everything else. Falling prices work ruin and disaster to industries and business. Men do not increase their industries or start new enterprises when everyone is losing money in their line. Industries and business are operated largely upon borrowed money. The demand for the loan of money is created by the activity of industries and business. Therefore interest is highest when industries and business are most thriving and lowest when they are diminished by falling prices. Consequently lower rates of interest, instead of proving that money has not appreciated in value, demonstrate the contrary. In other words, the appreciation of money, which is falling prices, has produced diminution of business, and therefore less demands for credits and lower interests.

Mr. Chairman, I therefore contend that my second proposition, namely, that in point of fact the demonetization of silver has greatly increased the value of gold, is clearly proven.

The third proposition is that the United States has the power to establish the parity in value of the metals at the ratio of 16 to 1.

In the discussion of this proposition, I wish to examine—

1. As to the supply of silver in the world available for coinage;
2. As to the demands which the United States as a Government can make upon silver;
3. As to the power of the people of the United States, contrasted with that of the people of the world;
4. As to the demands for silver which the people of this country must make under free coinage; and
5. As to the pivotal position this nation occupies among the gold-standard and silver-standard nations of the world.

Mr. Chairman, in order to show what great influence a powerful nation can exert in establishing the equal value of the metals, an important fact to be borne in mind is that there is now and always has been a shortage in the precious metals. This is demonstrated by the fact that governments, either through their treasury departments or their banking institutions, have been compelled, by reason of the lack of gold and silver currency and consequently of full-covered paper money, to issue a substitute therefor in the form of uncovered paper currency, called credit money. No nation would undertake the issuing of money based upon the general credit of the government or permit banking institutions to issue such money if there were not an imperative necessity for a greater circulating medium.

Consequently the total amount of such uncovered or credit money in the world indicates the existing shortage of metallic money. We know that there is in existence in the world at the present time, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $2,565,800,000 of such uncovered or credit money. With such an enormous shortage in the precious metals, you can readily see that a powerful nation would have much greater influence in establishing their parity of value than if there was an abundance or an oversupply of the same.

It is conceded on all sides that if the United States can make a greater demand upon silver than there is silver available for coinage in the world, the parity of value between the metals will be established. In other words, if we can make a greater demand at the mint rate than there is silver to supply that demand, then the mint rate will be established. The question, then, must be determined by the greatness of the demand which the United States can create for that metal. Let us, then, analyze that power.

The gold-standard men tell us that if a law is passed opening our mints to the free coinage of silver, immediately gold will go to a premium, and that if it goes to a premium of even 1 per cent, under the Gresham law it will leave the country. I do not believe that any such thing will occur, for the reason that speculation will foresee the enormous demand that this Government can make upon silver, and therefore gold will not go to a premium. But I want to assume, for the purpose of this argument, that gold will leave the country upon the enactment of a free-coinage law, because by such supposition we can more clearly estimate the enormous demands this Government can make upon silver and the consequent increase in the value of silver and more clearly estimate the increase of the supply of gold to gold-standard countries and the consequent decrease in the value of gold. If we are to test the strength of this Government as to these demands, you must grant us the most favorable conditions for the making of the same.

DEMANDS WHICH THE GOVERNMENT CAN MAKE ON SILVER.

Mr. Chairman, it is estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage, that there exists in the United States $696,300,000 of gold coin, an enormous amount. What effect would the withdrawal of that gold coin from the United States produce? There would be instantly created thereby a demand for $696,000,000 of silver coin or silver certificates to take its place. From where would the supply of silver come to satisfy such an enormous demand? You must remember what is conceded—that if the demand which the Government can make is greater than the supply it will establish the parity of the metals in value. There are but four sources from which it is possible that any silver can come.

1. The first source is from silver bullion.

We know that there is no large quantity of silver bullion in existence in the world. The reason we know it is that no man can point to where any considerable quantity is located. We know to the fraction of a dollar the quantity of gold coin and silver coin that are in all the banks in the world, and also of the gold bullion that exists in the form of bars; and if there were any considerable amount of silver bullion in the shape of bars, it could not be concealed. The sharp eyes of the reporters of the gold-standard organs would soon bring it to light as a great sensation.

The challenge has been made in the United States Senate time and again to show where there is more than $25,000,000 of silver bullion in existence in the world, outside of the United States Treasury, and no gold-standard man has ever attempted to point out where even such a quantity of silver bullion exists.

The reason there is no great quantity of silver bullion in existence is because it has not been profitable to keep silver in the form of bullion. Silver has been going down in price year after year ever since 1873, and consequently the man who has attempted to hoard or store silver bullion has lost not only by the lower price of silver itself, but also the interest on the amount he invested in the bullion. The truth is that as soon as silver bullion leaves the smelter it goes almost immediately into subsidiary coinage and into the arts. Therefore we could not expect this predicted supply of silver to come from silver bullion now in existence. In fact, we could not expect more than $25,000,000 to come from such a source, and that, of course, is a mere drop in the bucket compared to the enormous demand for $696,000,000, which would be created by the displacement of gold.

2. The second source from which it is said we must expect a large supply of silver is from the arts. But the man who makes such a statement ignores one fact, which will absolutely prevent any silver from coming from the arts. He ignores the fact that the cost of skilled workmanship upon the silver articles adds such a value to the articles as makes them worth more than the coinage value of the silver contained therein. It must be remembered that the cost of workmanship in the proportioning of the metals, in the molding, the polishing, the gilding, the carving, and other ornamentation of the article must be very great, and the man would be an idiot who would coin into dollars something that was worth more in the shape of a work of art. As man is guided by self-interest, it seems clear that not any of this pretended supply of silver would come from the arts. Not even any considerable part of the worn silver articles would be coined, because of the sentimental associations connected therewith.

3. The third source from which it is said we will have the flood of silver is from the countries of Europe. There is a great quantity of silver in the form of coins existing in Europe. It is said that they are of the value in our money of $1,500,000,000, but the man who says that these coins will come to this country in the event that we open our mints to the free coinage of silver is either ignorant of or ignores one important fact—that is, that the coins of Europe are in circulation upon a gold valuation, just like our silver dollars in this country are now in circulation upon a gold valuation. What would you think of the man who would take a United States silver dollar to our mint as soon as it was opened to free coinage and have it coined into another dollar? The dollar he has now is upon a gold valuation, and by minting it again he could not make it any more valuable. So the holder of European coins that are circulating upon a gold valuation could gain nothing by having them stamped at our mints. In fact, he would lose enormously by the transaction.

The ratio at which coins are in circulation in Europe is 15 to 1, which makes the coinage value of silver in Europe $1.33 an ounce, whereas in this country the ratio is 16 to 1, which makes the coinage value of silver $1.29 an ounce. The man holding European coins would lose not only the freight and insurance in bringing those coins to this country, but also would lose 4 cents on each ounce of silver coins that he brings. Those Europeans may not be so intelligent and bright as are the Americans, but they know enough not to lose 4 cents on each ounce of coins they import to us. Thus it is clear that silver coins in circulation in Europe would not be brought to our mints.

4. The fourth source from which they say we must expect a flood of silver is from the silver-standard countries. They are China, Mexico, Siam, Straits Settlements, Central and South American States, Persia, Tripoli, and Japan, constituting at least one-fourth of the nations of the world in commercial importance. Japan has adopted a gold standard, but upon the silver valuation, and is therefore still on a silver basis. In those countries silver circulates at its commercial value, namely, about 50 cents on the dollar, and consequently at first thought one might believe that silver would come from those countries to our mints. In order to determine whether any silver would come from those countries, it is important that their condition and needs of a circulating medium should be understood.

Mr. Chairman, if I knew but one fact, namely, the condition of gold and silver standard countries of the world for the past five years, I would know that the cause of the depression in the United States for that period was due to the gold standard; that it was due to the greatly increased demands made upon gold in 1892 and 1893 by the closing of the India mints to the free coinage of silver and the attempt to establish the gold standard in that country; by the large purchases of gold for the war chest of Russia; by the effort of Austria to resume specie payments in gold, and by the offer of our Government to redeem all the Treasury notes issued under the Sherman Act in gold. Every gold-standard country in the world, whether situated on this continent or the other, whether in the Northern Hemisphere or the Southern Hemisphere, ever since the closing of the India mints has been in the throes of a financial panic having the same trend of falling prices that prevailed in this country, and that fact existed irrespective as to whether in those countries there was a high tariff or a low tariff.

On the other hand, every silver-standard country in the world, whether situated upon this side of the waters or the other, whether north or south of the equator, and whether it has a high or a low tariff, is to-day and has been for the past five years, compared to its former condition, enjoying a marvelous degree of prosperity.

By this statement I am not saying that the Mexican is equal to the American, and I must say that the man who uses the statement "Do you want to Mexicanize America?" does not know the meaning or import of an argument. We could with equal propriety say, "Do you want to Turkeyize America?" for Turkey has the gold standard, and I am willing to contrast the civilization of Mexico at any time with that of Turkey; and I am willing further to contrast the wages paid in Mexico with not only those paid in Turkey, but also those paid in any European nation. I might further say, "Do you want to Egyptianize America?" for Egypt has the gold standard.

Do you want the civilization of the Portuguese, for they have the gold standard. The truth is that there are many things that determine the civilization of a nation, the most important of any being climate; and I apprehend that there is no danger of bringing the climate of Mexico to the United States. But these silver-standard nations, compared to their former condition of five years past, are marvelously advanced. In the last five years the exports of Mexico have increased more than 50 per cent. The number of manufactures in Japan and Mexico have more than doubled, and the railroad building in every silver-standard country has been increasing enormously, while in the gold-standard countries, instead of an increase of manufactures, there has been, during these five years, a shutting down and closing of them to an extent unknown before in the history of the nation. It is true that on account of the famine in India, the shortage of crops in Europe, and the war between the United States and Spain there has, in the last eighteen months, been an upward tendency in the price of some commodities, but when conditions again become normal the same low prices must again prevail.

These silver-standard countries, by reason of the increase in their commerce and manufactures, are in need more and more of a greater circulating medium, and consequently it becomes pertinent to inquire whether nations having such need for increase of money can easily yield up any quantity of money they have now for the purpose of bringing it to our mints for coinage into American dollars. When we look into the monetary statistics of those countries, we are struck with the fact that they have entirely too small a circulating medium for their own use to be able to part with any of their money. Mexico has a circulating medium of but $4.71 per capita, Japan but $4.09 per capita, the Central American States but $3.78 per capita, and China but $2.08 per capita, while we in the United States have a circulation, according to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, of $34 per capita, and France has a circulating medium of nearly $40 for each inhabitant. Is it possible that those silver-standard countries with a shortage of circulating medium now would be willing to part with that circulating medium in order to flood the United States with silver? Why, if Mexico should send all of her silver here, it would be but a bagatelle. The total circulating medium of Mexico in 1895 was but $50,000,000, and that is only about one-fourteenth part of the demand caused by the withdrawal of the $696,000,000 of gold.

Mr. Chairman, some people talk of this flood of silver as if it would be disastrous to the nation should it occur. No nation was ever injured by its people having an abundance of the precious metals, and instead of being a detriment, it would produce the greatest era of prosperity in the history of this country. Some people think that as soon as a foreigner brought silver to the United States mint and had it coined that there would be some American with gold chasing him, in order to get him to exchange the silver for a gold dollar. I apprehend that the American people are intelligent and that they are not going to exchange a gold for a silver dollar unless it is to their advantage to do so. When a foreigner brings his silver to our mints and has it coined into dollars, what is he going to do with his money?

You know that a foreign coin will not circulate in this country, neither will a United States silver dollar circulate in a foreign country, consequently it will do him no good to take the silver dollars back to his own country. The only thing that he can do with them is to buy something that we have for sale, and we are not going to sell him any more of our products than we think his silver dollar is worth. I am willing to put the shrewdness of the Yankee against that of any other people in the world. Consequently this flood of silver which is held up as such a great "bogy man," even if possible, would turn out to be one of the greatest blessings that could possibly happen to this country.

So it seems to me to be clear that these silver-standard countries, in view of the small circulating medium they now have and of the immense upward impetus in their commerce and manufacturing industries, could not part with any considerable amount of their circulating medium to dump into the United States, and therefore I do not think we could have any flood of silver.

But suppose these silver-standard countries could take from their own circulating mediums the enormous sum of $696,000,000, bring it to the United States, and thus supply the demand caused by the withdrawal of gold! The man who thinks that the powers of the United States are exhausted does not know the strength of this Government.

There are in existence $346,000,000 of credit money, called United States notes, the existence of every dollar of which is due to the fact that we have not enough circulating medium without those notes. Every dollar of those notes could be retired by the substitution of the silver dollar or the silver certificate, and thus there would be a demand which the Government could create for $346,000,000 more of silver. I am free to say that if the law providing for the free coinage of silver were passed to-day, under President McKinley's Administration, with the Secretary of the Treasury discriminating against silver, as he has in the past, that this Government could not establish the parity of the metals. But under an administration that would use the powers of the Government for the purpose of establishing the parity of the metals, I have no doubt of the ability of this nation to establish that parity.

But these are not all the powers of our Government. There are in existence $231,441,686 of national-bank notes. The only excuse for their existence is the fact that they are absolutely needed as a circulating medium. Every dollar of that credit money could be retired and silver or silver certificates substituted in place. Thus there can be created by this Government a demand for the enormous sum of $1,275,000,000 of silver, all at once if desired, without increasing the circulating medium one dollar. It seems to me, in view of that great demand, there can be no reasonable doubt of the ability of this Government to establish the parity of the metals.

We have had an experience which should teach every one the power of this nation. In 1890 Congress passed the Sherman Act, which provided for the purchase of only 4,500,000 ounces of silver per month. Under a demand for simply that amount of silver that metal rose in price higher and higher until it reached 1.21½ per ounce, within eight points of par, not only at the mint in Philadelphia and on the exchange at New York, but in London, in Calcutta, and in every other market in the world. If such a small demand raised the price of silver to such a height under a limited coinage act, it seems to me clear that the instantaneous demand for $1,275,000,000, or 200 times as much, would certainly establish the parity of the metals. If we should increase our circulating medium to correspond with that of France, we would make a demand for $750,000,000 more of silver, or a total demand for $2,025,000,000 of silver. That amount is more than three times as much as there is silver in the world that could possibly come to our mints.

POWER AND WEALTH OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. Chairman, great as the Government is, there is something still greater, and that is the people of the United States. We are the greatest people on earth. We are the greatest producers and consumers on the face of the globe. Our 75,000,000 of people are equal to 700,000,000 of the average of the balance of the world.

It is strange, but nevertheless true, that many Americans do not appreciate the great power and wealth of this country, and it is remarkable that in order to prove our high position among the nations we have to quote from foreign authorities.

Mr. Mulhall, an eminent statistician of England, a few years ago, in an article in the North American Review, analyzed the effective force and power of this country and made the startling statement that in power and effective force the United States was nearly equal to Great Britain, France, and Germany combined. He said:

If we take a survey of mankind in ancient or modern times as regards the physical, mechanical, and intellectual forces of nations, we find nothing to compare with the United States.

Professor Francois, a French economist, in a recent article in an economic paper of Paris, stated that the wealth and power of the United States was one-fourth of that of the world; that the wealth in 1890 was $62,600,000,000, while that of the entire world was $291,580,000,000.

There is no nation which can compare with ours. It is only by comparison with groups of nations or with the balance of the world that the greatness of these United States is shown.

Mr. Chairman, a comparison of the statistics concerning the commercial, agricultural, mining, and manufacturing industries of this country will conclusively show that in commercial importance we are between one-fourth and one-third of the entire world, or between one-third and one-half of the balance of the world.

No better test can be found as to the amount of commerce done by a nation than the number of tons of freight carried by its railroads. The foreign trade of every nation, consisting only of its surplus products, must be small compared to the business of the nation itself. It is said that one railroad in the United States, the Pennsylvania Central, carries more freight than that which constitutes all our foreign trade.

The total railroad mileage of the United States is nearly half as much as that of the entire world, there being 182,776 miles of railroad exclusive of side trackage in the United States, as against 436,240 miles for the entire world, or 253,474 miles for the balance of the world.

The tons of freight carried by the railroads of the United States are more than one-half of that carried by the railroads of the world. According to Mr. Mulhall, the United States carried in 1892, 845,000,000 tons of freight 100 miles, as against 1,348,000,000 tons carried by the world the same distance, or 503,000,000 tons carried by the balance of the world. These figures present the startling fact that the United States carries more freight than all the rest of the world.

The expenditures of the railroads of the United States are $775,000,000, against $1,535,000,000 for the entire world, or $760,000,000 for the balance of the world. Our expenses for transporting freight were more than that of the rest of the world.

The receipts of the railroads of the United States are $1,095,000,000, as against the total receipts for the world of $2,515,000,000.

The steam power of the United States, according to Mr. Mulhall, is nearly one-third of that of the entire world, or between one-third and one-half that of the balance of the world, being 14,400,000 horsepower, as against 50,150,000 horsepower for all the world.

The carrying power of vessels used in lake and river traffic in the United States is 9,300,000 tons, which is one-fifth of the carrying power of the world on the high seas. The navigable waterways and canals of this country are 51,820 miles, while those of the earth are 170,550 miles. Add the tons of freight carried on ocean, lakes, canals, and rivers to those carried by railroads and it will show that the United States transports by water and rail nearly as many tons as are carried by the rest of the world.

The United States in 1896 produced 10,235,000 bales of cotton of 400 pounds each out of a total production of the world of 13,330,000 bales, or ten-thirteenths of the world's cotton, and in 1897 produced 10,305,000 bales, out of a total product of the world of 13,139,000 bales, or three-fourths of the world's crop.

This nation in 1896 consumed 3,422,600 bales of cotton of 400 pounds each of the entire consumption of the world of 13,330,000 bales, or about one-fourth.

The production of corn in the United States is more than four-fifths of that of the whole world, being in 1896 2,283,000,000 bushels, as against 2,714,240,000 for the world, or four times as much as that produced by the rest of the world.

The production of wheat in this country is between one-fourth and one-fifth of that of the entire world.

The total production of grain in the United States in 1896 was more than half as much as that of the rest of the world, being 3,533,188,000 bushels, while that of the entire world was about 9,900,000,000 bushels, or about 6,600,000,000 bushels for the balance of the world.

In 1896, according to the Statistician and Economist, we had 15,124,057 horses out of 73,335,694 in the world; 2,278,946 mules out of 8,952,984 in the world; 42,842,759 hogs out of 104,193,746 in the world.

According to Mr. Mulhall's Dictionary of Statistics our product is as follows:

	Quantity.	World's product.
Fish.....tons..	600,000	2,306,000
Beef.....do..	2,190,000	7,205,000

Tobacco.....do..	210,000	768,000
Quicksilver.....flasks..	96,104	105,644

More than one-fourth of the pig iron of the world is produced by this nation, in 1896 being 8,761,197 tons, out of a total production of 31,009,831 tons for the entire world.

We produce one-third of the total steel in the world, in 1896 being 5,366,518 tons, out of the world's production of 17,591,131 tons.

The copper product of the United States is more than half that of the entire world, being 203,893 tons in 1896, against 373,208 tons for the world, or 80,000 tons more than all the rest of the world.

The production of coal in the United States for the year 1897 was 198,250,000 tons, while that of the entire world was about 600,000,000 tons, nearly one-half as much as that of the balance of the globe.

The coal fields of the United States comprise nearly half of those of the world, being 194,000 square miles, as against 471,800 square miles.

We produce more than half of all the petroleum of the world, being in 1894 48,412,666 barrels, while that of all the world was 84,330,809 barrels.

The forest products of this nation are nearly one-half that of the balance of the world, being annually 9,300,000,000 cubic feet of lumber, against 32,460,000,000 for the world.

Our forest lands are 466,000,000 acres, while those of all the earth are 1,308,000,000 acres.

The United States produces more than one-fourth of the gold of the world, the product in 1896 being $53,088,000, as against $202,956,000 for the world.

The silver production of this country is more than one-third of that of the entire world, being in 1896 $76,069,000, coinage value, as against $213,463,700, coinage value, for the world.

The amount of life insurance in force in this country is $13,742,495,420, as against $5,923,168,549 for the balance of the world.

The length of the world's telegraph system in 1897 was 4,909,823 miles, of which there was 2,516,548 miles in America.

The number of newspapers in the United States in 1897 was 20,569, as against 50,000 for the entire world.

The number of copies of monthly publications in the United States in 1890 was 230,000,000, while that of the world was 813,000,000.

The number of post-offices in the United States in 1895 were 71,258, while there were 225,354 in the world.

The number of letters, postal cards, papers, and book packets sent through the mail in 1895 was 5,664,138,718 in the United States, while it was 17,046,443,939 in the entire world. The people of the United States send half as much mail matter as the balance of the world.

The number of telephones in the United States is 900,000, as against 1,402,100 in the entire world, or nearly twice as many as the rest of the world.

Considerable investigation has been made in recent years as to the mechanical force that a man is capable of exerting and of the comparative energy of the men of each nation. The adult laborer, it is estimated, each day expends in energy sufficient strength to lift 300 tons 1 foot. That power of a man is recognized as the unit and is called a "foot-ton."

It is calculated that the power of a horse is ten times that of a man. If everything were done by hand, the mechanical power of nations compared to each other would be nearly in the proportion of their population. But on account of the forces that Americans have produced by their inventive genius the power that we exert is almost incomprehensible.

Mr. Mulhall has applied this foot-ton principle in ascertaining the comparative strength of nations. He estimates that in 1895 the working energy of the United States was 129,306,000,000 foot-tons daily, or 1,940 foot-tons daily per capita. In other words, the forces used in this nation for each individual are 1,940 times as much as could be exerted by a man without the aid of tools or machinery. That daily force of the United States is sufficient to lift 600,000 pounds 24,489,772 miles each day, or, eliminating the resistance of the air, sufficient to send that weight around the world nearly 1,000 times each day.

When we compare the mechanical force of this nation with that of the rest of the world, it shows that in strength we are nearly equal to one-half the balance of the world. That force is:

	Foot-tons daily.
In the United States.....	129,306,000,000
In Great Britain.....	56,100,000,000
In Germany.....	45,580,000,000
In France.....	34,580,000,000
In Austria.....	22,510,000,000
In Italy.....	11,390,000,000
In Spain.....	10,640,000,000
In balance of world is about.....	120,000,000,000
Total for the world.....	430,106,000,000

Mr. Chairman, great as these figures may show our country to be, our manufacturing industries are still greater.

The products of manufactures in the United States, according to Mr. Mulhall, are one-half as much as those of the balance of the world, being annually $7,215,000,000, while those of the entire world are $22,370,000,000.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], now Speaker of this House, in a speech before this body on February 1, 1894, referring to the manufacturing interests of this country, said:

I do not vouch, nor can anyone vouch for these figures, but the proportion of one-third to two-thirds nobody can forcibly dispute. We produce one-third and the rest of the world, England included, two-thirds. The population of the world is 1,500,000,000, of which we have 50,000,000, which leaves 1,450,000,000 for the rest of mankind. We use all our manufactures or the equivalent of them. Hence we are equal to one-half the whole globe outside of ourselves, England included, and compared as a market with the rest of the world our population is equal to 700,000,000.

With such an array of facts and figures, who can doubt that this nation in commerce, mining, manufactures, and agriculture is equal to at least one-fourth if not one-third of all the nations of the world? With such a power and such a force, is it possible that we are too weak to establish a financial policy of our own?

DEMANDS THE PEOPLE OF THIS COUNTRY MUST MAKE ON SILVER UNDER FREE COINAGE.

Mr. Chairman, it has been estimated that there are between $20,000,000,000 and $30,000,000,000 of long-time indebtedness, consisting of national, State, county, city, and corporation bonds, and individual promissory notes, owed in this nation. Over one-half of this is payable in lawful money of the United States.

Under free coinage, silver dollars become legal tender for the payment of all that ten or fifteen billions of debt. It is a principle recognized in all political economies that if one dollar is cheaper than another, that all the obligations payable in lawful money will be paid in the cheaper dollar, and thus if silver should ever go to a discount compared to gold, there would be that enormous demand created for silver by the debtors who owe the $10,000,000,000 or $15,000,000,000. With such an enormous demand upon the limited quantity of silver available for coinage, is it possible that anyone would part with silver at an appreciable discount? You must remember that this silver dollar is not only a legal tender for the payment of private debts, but it is also a legal tender for the discharge of State, county, and city taxes, which aggregate about $500,000,000 a year. It is a legal tender for the payment of all import duties, internal-revenue duties, and postage dues of the National Government, and you must remember that the National Government raises by those duties the enormous sum of almost $500,000,000 a year.

The premiums contracted to be paid in lawful money each year in the United States upon life-insurance policies is $323,902,327, and upon fire-insurance policies is $158,819,888.

The total amount of life insurance in force in the United States, all of which is payable in lawful money, is $13,742,495,420.

According to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the year 1897, the amount of deposits, payable in lawful money, in our—

Savings banks is.....	$1,989,376,035
National banks is.....	1,853,349,128
State banks is.....	723,640,795
Loan and trust companies is.....	566,922,205
Private banks is.....	50,278,243

The amount of loans, consisting mostly of thirty, sixty, and ninety day paper, all of which is payable in lawful money, in favor of our—

Savings banks is.....	$1,066,507,686
National banks is.....	2,066,776,113
State banks is.....	669,973,556
Loan and trust companies is.....	445,629,725
Private banks is.....	50,278,243

The total amount payable on shares in building associations is $450,667,594. The amounts agreed to be paid in lawful money at periods of from one to five years, on contracts for construction of buildings, railroads, ships, canals, and other improvements in the United States, must aggregate several billions of dollars.

The desire on the part of all the people and corporations owing these enormous amounts to pay in the cheaper money would make such a tremendous demand upon silver should it go to a discount of even 1 per cent as to immediately restore its parity with gold. No one would part with silver dollars or silver certificates at a discount when he could utilize them at par for so many purposes and to such enormous extent.

It is claimed by the gold-standard people that there can be no parity maintained between the metals, because there is a variation in the amount of each produced. They seem to lose sight of the fact that in addition to the question of production there is an increased demand made for the cheaper metal by reason of the legal-tender quality given to the money coined therefrom.

Under free coinage the minute one metal becomes cheaper than the other all the demand is taken from the dearer and transferred to the cheaper metal. That demand is so great compared to the difference in annual production that it almost immediately restores the value of the cheaper metal. It is on that account that bimetalism acts as an automatic regulator of the value of the metals. From the years 1800 to 1841 there was three times as much silver produced in the world as gold, and from the year 1850 to 1873 there was more than three times as much gold produced as silver, and yet during all that time, while the mints of France were open to the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold, the variation between the market price of both silver and gold did not exceed the difference between the coinage ratio of the various nations.

I hold in my hand a tabulated list of the commercial ratio of silver to gold from 1687 to 1893, taken from the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1894, at page 288, which I ask to have incorporated in my remarks.

Commercial ratio of silver to gold for each year since 1687.

By that tabulated list it is apparent that only in two years up to 1873 did silver fall below the ratio of 16 to 1, and then only by a very small fraction, and that was in the years 1812 and 1813, when the Napoleonic wars disturbed all commercial transactions; and the difference between the London price, where free coinage did not exist, and the Paris price, where free coinage did exist, must have been at its maximum. From the time that the nations of the world began to take away the principal demand for silver by demonetizing it, silver began to decline in value as compared to gold.

The only way its value can be restored is to give it the same rights of legal tender, redemption money, and free coinage as is now given to gold.

WHY IS IT?

Mr. Chairman, why should the coinage ratio between silver and gold be fixed at 16 to 1? Because that is the proportion, as near as can be ascertained, in which the metals exist in the earth. It is, therefore, the true ratio.

Although for several years the production of one metal at that ratio exceeds the other, yet in a long series of years the total amount produced is very near sixteen times as much silver in weight as gold, or at coinage value about equal.

The table of the production of silver and gold from 1741 to the present time shows that there was produced in that period 360,459,124 ounces of gold and 5,727,841,723 ounces of silver. Divide the silver by the gold and you will obtain as the result 15½. That demonstrates that for the period of more than 150 years there was almost exactly 16 times as many ounces of silver produced as of gold, and that the coinage value of the same was about equal.

WHY MEXICO DOES NOT ESTABLISH PARITY OF METALS.

Our gold friends tell us that the mint is open to the free coinage of silver in Mexico and ask why does not that establish the parity of the metals. They talk of Mexico as if it were a gigantic power. Do you know that the commerce of Mexico is not equal to that of the State of Illinois, and would you expect the State of Illinois, unaided by the rest of the States in the Union, to establish the parity of the metals? The reason Mexico does not establish the parity of the metals is because it is not sufficiently powerful in commerce to do so, but when you compare Mexico with the United States you compare a pigmy to a giant. You must remember that this great nation is composed of forty-five great States, and that an act of Congress is simply an international agreement in itself among those forty-five great States.

THE PIVOTAL POSITION WE OCCUPY IN THE FINANCIAL WORLD.

Mr. Chairman, in determining what a powerful effect such a nation as the United States would have in establishing the parity of the metals, you must take into consideration the pivotal position that it occupies as to the monetary systems of the world. The silver-standard nations, which make their demands upon silver alone for currency, constitute one-fourth of the nations of the world in commercial importance. The world is then divided into nations, one-fourth of which are upon the silver standard and three-fourths of which are upon the gold standard. The United States alone, as I have stated, constitutes in wealth, commerce, and power at least one-fourth of the world.

Let that power of the United States be transferred from gold to silver, and you immediately have the world divided into equal parts, one-half the nations in commercial importance making their demands upon silver and the other half in commercial importance making their demands upon gold, and thus we have an equal demand upon equal metals, which, according to the principle of supply and demand, must make an equal price.

A BIMETALLIC STANDARD OF VALUE NOT A BIMETALLIC CURRENCY IN EACH NATION.

There is great confusion in the minds of many people between a bimetallic standard of value and a bimetallic circulating medium. Many people think that you can not have a bimetallic standard of value unless in each country gold and silver circulate side by side. It is quite immaterial and unimportant, as far as measuring values is concerned, whether gold and silver circulate in each nation.

You can have a bimetallic standard of value without silver circulating in a gold-standard country or gold circulating in a silver-standard country. If one-half of the nations of the world in commercial importance were to adopt the single gold standard and not permit silver coin to circulate in those countries, and if the other one-half of the nations in commercial importance were to adopt a single silver standard and not permit gold coin to circulate in those countries, the world nevertheless would be upon a bimetallic standard of value, because there would be an equal demand created upon an equal quantity of metals, which would produce an equal price. You can readily see that, though the silver did not circulate in the gold countries, it would be doing service in another part of the world as primary money, and consequently would be relieving the strain upon gold, just as much as if it circulated side by side with the gold in that gold-standard country.

Many people think that because there were but 8,000,000 silver dollars coined in the United States previous to 1873 we were not upon a bimetallic standard. The reason no more silver dollars were coined in the United States was because the ratio of 15½ to 1 prevailed at the French mint, which made silver worth $1.33 an ounce, whereas our ratio of 16 to 1 made it worth $1.29 an ounce. The holder of silver bullion in the United States at the expenditure of 1 cent per ounce could transmit his silver to the French mint and thus make 3 cents more per ounce than he could make by having it coined into American dollars. Is it any wonder, then, that there were no more silver dollars coined in America than 8,000,000? But during that period the great quantity of silver that we transferred to France was doing duty and service as money in Europe, and was therefore relieving the strain upon gold equally as much as if that silver were in circulation in the United States.

A FREE-COINAGE LAW WOULD MAKE CAPITALISTS HELP ELEVATE THE VALUE OF SILVER.

It must be borne in mind also, in determining what great influence a powerful nation like the United States will have in establishing the parity of the metals, that, although the people of the United States are nearly equally divided upon the question of opening our mints to the free coinage of silver, 7,000,000 having voted for President McKinley and 6,500,000 having voted for Mr. Bryan, the minute that a free-coinage act is passed all of this difference of opinion will vanish, and we will have a united nation and a united people using all their powers to establish the equal value of the metals.

Why is this true? Because all of the capitalists in the country have obligations that are payable in lawful money, the United States bonds themselves held by national banks being payable in coin; and when silver under free coinage becomes lawful money, with full legal-tender powers to discharge those obligations, immediately it becomes the interest of those capitalists and banks to elevate the price of silver, to make the purchasing power of the silver dollar just as great as they now desire the purchasing power of the gold dollar to become, and hence the minute a free-coinage law is passed, that minute you have all the power of Wall street exercised to its utmost to elevate the price of silver. It has been the history of depreciated currencies that no class of people have exercised such a wonderful influence and power in elevating such depressed currencies to par with coin as have the capitalistic class, and therefore the wealth and power of the entire nation would never permit silver to go to a discount.

I therefore conclude that, on account of the fact that there is now a shortage in the precious metals to the enormous extent of $2,500,000,000; on account of the pivotal position in the world which the United States in commerce holds, being able by throwing its influence from the gold to the silver side of this controversy to equally divide the nations in commercial importance in their demands upon the precious metals, thus making an equal demand upon equal quantities of metal, and thereby producing an equal price; on account of the enormous demand which this nation can make upon the silver of the world; on account of the limited quantity of silver in the world that could be brought to our mints, it seems to me that the United States could as certainly produce an equality in value of the metals as it is possible to foretell any future event.

It must be remembered that when you elevate silver to the value of gold you do not have to elevate the silver that is contained in our own currency, as that is already upon a gold valuation. You do not have to elevate the great mass of silver coins in Europe, because they are upon a gold valuation. You do not have to elevate the silver in the arts, because that silver by reason of the cost of workmanship is now worth more than the coinage value of silver. The only silver in the world that must be elevated in price is simply the quantity of silver in the silver standard countries, which those nations will assist in elevating by their own demands upon it as primary money.

It seems to me, therefore, conclusive, Mr. Chairman, that my third proposition is proven, namely, that the United States, by reason of its great power, by reason of its pivotal position among the nations of the earth, single-handed and alone, could establish the parity of the metals.

COULD BIMETALLISM BE MAINTAINED?

It is also contended by our opponents that bimetalism could not be maintained because in a year or two after silver reached $1.29 an ounce its production would be so great as to overcome the demands of this nation. That reasoning as to increase of production would be true as to wheat, corn, or other products where the amount that can be raised is unlimited, but it does not apply to silver.

The variation between the amount of silver produced when its price is high and low is very small. Why? Because the greater portion of silver is extracted from ore that contains both gold and silver. When more than half the value of the ore is from the gold, it is called a gold mine, with silver as a by-product, and vice versa. Those ores will be mined even if silver should go to 10 cents an ounce, because they would be worked for the gold therein; and if silver were $1.29 an ounce, those mines could not produce very much more. It must be remembered that under bimetalism the purchasing power of gold and silver is correlative. As the value of silver increases the purchasing power of gold declines, hence the net value of the ore remains about the same.

It is the low-grade mines which yield the greater part of both gold and silver, because they are so numerous and it takes generations to exhaust them. It is true there are some mines that produce silver without any gold, but they are very few compared to the number that contain both gold and silver. They are generally very rich and easily exhausted. Their product bears no greater relation to the total silver produced than the free gold contained in placer claims bears to the total production of gold. Hence there is no danger that in the long run there will be any great variation between the quantity of silver and gold produced.

Eliminating the amount that goes into the arts, the annual production of neither gold nor silver has ever exceeded 3 per cent of the world's stock of the same, and it is not likely that such proportion will ever be exceeded. Besides, as soon as silver reaches par, or anywhere near par, the Latin Union and any number of other nations that have grown weary of the experiment of gold monometallism will give the same mintage rights to silver as they now do to gold, and thus restore the great blessings of a stable par of exchange between the nations of the world.

THE FUTURE OF THE SILVER QUESTION.

Mr. Chairman, those who claim that the battle for free coinage of silver has been fought and lost, and that it will never be the leading issue again, do not realize what must yet be done, and how slowly in accomplishment in order to establish the gold standard. The next step to be taken by the gold-standard powers will be to treat all silver and silver certificates as credit money redeemable in gold. The Secretary of the Treasury has already announced that he will directly redeem the silver in gold when in his judgment there is any necessity for so doing. After that policy is firmly established, the gold-standard nations will attempt to absolutely destroy all silver as money. They will claim with irresistible logic that if silver money is redeemable in gold, it is nothing more than a promise to pay gold; that a promise to pay can be printed on paper at a small fraction of the expense required to buy silver bullion and coin it into money. The gold advocates of this country will claim that it is foolish for the United States to have nearly $500,000,000 invested in silver coins when they are merely promises to pay gold.

Again, it will be claimed that as silver coins can be counterfeited out of silver bullion for about 50 cents on the dollar, so perfectly that Government employees can not detect the same, the use of silver coins is dangerous to the circulating medium. Already this argument is being used with great force in Europe. Legislation by gold-standard nations will then surely follow, providing for the retirement and sale of all silver coins. Those so-called friends of silver, who profess to believe in an enlarged use of silver redeemable in gold, are simply playing into the hands of the gold monometallists. The logical result of the establishment of the gold standard is the absolute annihilation of silver as money. That means greatly increased burdens upon, demand for, and value of, gold and greatly decreased price of all commodities and property.

The establishment of the gold standard throughout the world means ultimately the redemption in gold of all the inconvertible paper currencies now in existence. So long as a paper currency is inconvertible it acts as primary money and relieves the strain upon gold. Such a greatly increased demand for gold will surely produce falling prices, with their attendant ruinous effects. We are beginning to realize the truth of the statement of Secretary John G. Carlisle in the House of Representatives in 1878, when he said, concerning the destruction by legislation of silver money, that—

The consummation of such a scheme would ultimately entail more misery upon the human race than all the wars, pestilence, and famine that ever occurred in the history of the world.

The silver question, therefore, must continue to be the leading issue until won or lost. It can not be lost for decades.

Is it any wonder, Mr. Chairman, that we who believe such fatal results will follow from the establishment of the gold standard should fight with all the intensity of our being such legislation, or that we should pledge ourselves anew to the cause that in our opinion will alleviate the bad conditions, prevent the destruction of business and enterprise resulting from falling prices, and produce an era of development and prosperity unparalleled in the history of the world? [Applause.]

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, the honor and good faith of the Government of the United States is pledged to the payment of its debts in all cases where the kind of payment is not specified in such legal tender, if it has more than one, as its creditors may select at the time of payment. For the reason, if there was no other, that the Government alone, in the exercise of its arbitrary though legal power, makes the tenders for the payment of debts, and can change them at its own will, without the consent of its creditors. There are no two parties, and there can not be, to this transaction. The Government, therefore, in promising to pay its creditors a certain number of the units of its own coinage must, in honor and business fairness, allow its creditors to select the tender in which to receive the payment.

In the business transactions of individuals neither party has anything to do with making tenders for the payment of debts and are in no way responsible for their change. Hence, each takes the chance as to what may be legal tender at the time of the maturity of their contracts. The debtor, being the party to pay, has the right, therefore, in all business fairness, to select the tender with which he will pay. Not so with the Government, which makes the tenders, when it is itself the debtor, for the Government is bound to see to it that all the tenders it creates for the payment of debts are at all times the equivalent, one with the other, in commercial value. And it is this obligation which in business fairness makes its position in the payment of its debts different from that of individuals.

If that is not the case, then the Government could make a tender perfectly worthless with which to pay its debts, while a tender good in commercial value is in use. For instance, the lawmaking power could buy copper and have each ounce of it stamped at the mint $1, then make such dollars a tender in the payment of debts, and with such copper money pay all its coin obligations. That would be just as honest and just as fair a business transaction as to pay its coin obligations in any legal-tender dollar of a commercial value of 30 or 40 cents or less.

All the laws ever enacted changing the ratio in weight of one money metal to another were for the purpose of keeping one the equivalent of the other in commercial value. If the Government neglects this plain duty, it can not on the first great principle of equity take advantage of its own wrong. It must, therefore, in honor and fair business dealing allow its creditors the option of the tenders in the payment of its debts. It has the power, of course, to pay its debts in anything, or not to pay them at all. For it makes the legal tenders and can not be sued without its consent. Hence it is under a double obligation, in honesty and fair dealing, to allow its creditors the option of tenders, if it has more than one, at the time of payment.

The creditors of governments which have a bank like England, France, and Germany, through which they do their financial business, collecting the government revenues and holding them on deposit, must receive over the counters of such banks the legal tender offered by the bank, for the bank in this case, not the government, is the debtor, and the bank does not make the tenders. Hence, it has the same right of option in paying its debts as an individual. But when the government itself is the debtor, and makes the tenders for the payment of debts, it has in business fairness no such right of option in paying its debts at the counter of its own treasury.

The law of 1862, which authorized the first issue of legal-tender Treasury notes, by its accepted terms at the time of passage and by the understanding of its supporters bound the Government in good faith to pay its debts in gold or its equivalent.

In discussions upon debatable legislation it is always desirable to have the correct history of such legislation, and, if possible, the reasons existing for it at the time of its enactment, especially if the laws are of an unusual character. The House will, therefore, bear with me in recalling briefly a part of the history of the legislation creating our national debt.

The first session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, in obedience to the proclamation of the President, convened on Thursday, July 4, 1861. On Monday, the 8th of July, the House was fully organized by the election of all its officers and the appointment of its standing committees. Both Houses adjourned finally on Monday, the 6th day of August, having been in session thirty-three days, including five Sundays. In these twenty-eight working days acts were passed revising the tariff, levying direct and internal taxes, reorganizing the military establishment of the Government, enlarging the Navy, increasing the Regular Army, authorizing the enlistment and equipment of 500,000 men, and a loan of $250,000,000 was authorized and $300,000,000 were appropriated for the support of the Army for the then current year.

At that session, after disposing of the foregoing measures and others of public necessity, it was not thought advisable to take up the financial question, therefore no change was made in the money then in use, though every member of either House regarded the financial policy to be adopted by the Government to meet the contingencies of the then overhanging future as the most vital as well as the most difficult question to be settled in legislation. The shot had already been fired at Sumter which, like that at Lexington, rang round the world.

At the next session, beginning December 2, 1861, almost three months were spent in the discussion and consideration of the financial policy to be adopted by the Government. One hundred and fifty million dollars in gold had already been borrowed from the banks of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. Specie payments had been suspended in the previous November. A bill was finally matured in the House, authorizing the issue of bonds, bearing 6 per cent interest, to the amount of $500,000,000, since known as the five-twenties, and $150,000,000 of Treasury notes, known as "greenbacks," without interest, but legal tender in payment of debts.

At that time the Government was in a life-and-death struggle for its existence. Its Treasury was empty and its credit greatly impaired. At such a time the Government was about to appeal for a loan of $500,000,000, to be repeated how soon, or how often, no human sagacity could then foretell, with which to provision, clothe, and equip its defenders on the battlefield. Without such munitions of war, no matter how brave their hearts, their arms would have been as powerless as if paralyzed in death. The vital question with those charged with the administration of the Government at that time was, therefore, how to give the greatest possible credit to the Government in securing such loans of money as it must have.

This question gave rise to greatly diverse opinions. There was no difference of opinion in either House as to the bonds to be authorized. The differences of opinion were as to the kind of Treasury notes, if any, to be issued. There were those in both Houses, not small in number nor of inferior ability or statesmanship, who were opposed to issuing any kind of Treasury notes, and who advocated the policy of keeping the Government on a specie-paying basis by selling bonds in the market for gold with which to do it. Others were opposed to that policy and in favor of issuing Treasury notes, made legal tender for all debts and demands of every kind. Others favored the issue of Treasury notes legal tender for all dues to the United States and for all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, but not a legal tender between individuals.

In the bill that first passed the House these notes were made legal tender in payment of debts of all kinds, public and private.

The Senate amended the bill by adding after claims and demands against the United States, "except interest on the bonds and notes of the United States." The reason for this amendment was elaborately presented by Senator Fessenden, of Maine, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. Senator Collamer, of Vermont, discussing the amendment, said:

The bill as it came from the House of Representatives, in order to give currency to these notes, provided that men should have a right, when they had a quantity of them, to fund them in Government bonds, having twenty years to run, with interest payable in what? In these very notes that they had put in. It was saying to them, "If you will only take these notes, you may fund them in a bond, and take your pay in the notes again." What a financial juggle is that? That is the form in which it came to us from the other House; but an amendment reported by our committee and adopted by the Senate provides that the interest, at least, shall be payable in money.

This amendment to pay interest in coin had been reported unanimously by the Finance Committee, and it passed the Senate without a division. This amendment and one pledging the proceeds from the sales of the public lands in payment of the bonds—after the bill was returned from the Senate—caused a long and very earnest debate in the House. The following extracts from speeches made in the House will show what was the prevailing sentiment at that time as to the meaning of the word "coin" in the amendment:

Mr. Spaulding, chairman of the subcommittee on Ways and Means, who reported the bill that passed the House, and who was in favor of only one kind of money, in opposing the amendment of the Senate to pay interest on the bonds and notes in coin, said:

All bonds and Treasury notes heretofore issued are payable generally without specifying that either the principal or the interest shall be paid in coin, and yet the legal effect is the same.

By all means let us pay the interest in gold to those who desire it, if it is possible to do so.

Suppose the public debt to amount to the sum of $1,000,000,000 in one year from this time. Six per cent interest on this sum would require $60,000,000 in gold to be obtained annually—$30,000,000 every six months to pay interest. How is the gold to be obtained? You will not get it from taxes or from duty on imports, because these by the bill are payable in Treasury notes. The only way, then, to get this gold will be by selling your bonds at the market price to procure it. This is a large amount of coin to be procured on a forced sale of your bonds—$30,000,000 every six months.

A sum greater than all the gold possessed by the New York banks at this time. The fact that you create by your bill this large demand for gold will tend greatly to enhance the price.

Mr. Pomeroy, who had opposed the issue of legal-tender paper in any form, in advocating the amendment of the Senate to pay interest in coin, said:

The credit of the Government has been recently brought to the test of practical experiment in a much more favorable time than the present, when the banks were plethora with gold beyond all former experience and promptly meeting all engagements in coin.

Now, this paper is or is not equal to gold. My colleague may take whichever horn of the dilemma he pleases. If it is not, it is folly to suppose that people are voluntarily going to place themselves in a position where, for a term of years, they compel themselves to receive it in interest and assume all the risk of depreciation. If it is equal, then there can be no unjust discrimination in paying interest in gold.

While we exercise the power to compel the people to receive it as gold in the payment of debts, we unfortunately have not the power to compel them to loan it back to us on time and receive more of the same kind in interest.

The Committee on Ways and Means are talking about paying, whereas the problem is how to borrow. If capital will seek Treasury notes at par for the purpose of investment in bonds, with the interest payable in notes, how much more readily will it seek the same notes, at a slight depreciation, for the purpose of such investment with the interest payable in gold.

No inducement is offered by the House to fund these notes in the nature of the new security. The credit of the Government is alike bound for the payment of both classes of indebtedness ultimately in gold.

Mr. Stevens, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who had from the first advocated but one kind of money, either all paper or all coin, to be used, whichever it might be, for all purposes whatsoever, said:

All classes of people shall take these notes at par for every article of trade or contract, unless they have money enough to buy United States bonds, and then they shall be paid in gold.

In discussing the report of the committee of conference on the bill, Mr. Stevens, who was chairman of the committee, said in reference to the action of the conference committee:

We provided that the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to raise gold to pay this interest, should throw into market the bonds of the United States at whatever they would bring. * * * We saw no way but to raise the coin in some other mode than selling our paper. * * * We made the imports payable in coin.

In all the discussion in either House on paying interest in coin the words "coin" and "gold" were used indiscriminately. No one had any idea then that the interest would ever be paid in silver or that the bonds at their maturity would be paid in anything but gold, as all such bonds had always been paid theretofore.

The House finally concurred in the Senate amendment for paying interest in coin, but nonconcurred in the pledge of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. The committee of conference on the bill struck out the pledge of the proceeds from the sales of public lands and inserted in lieu thereof that duties on imports should be paid in coin, and that was agreed to in both Houses without a division. In this way the disagreement between the two Houses was finally settled, and the act of February 25, 1862, became a law with the following provisions relative to the United States notes and the national debt that might be created:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue on the credit of the United States $150,000,000 of United States notes, not bearing interest, payable to bearer, at the Treasury of the United States.

And such notes herein authorized shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin; and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid.

And such United States notes shall be received the same as coin at their par value in payment for any loans that may be hereafter sold or negotiated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to fund the Treasury notes and floating debt of the United States he is hereby authorized to issue on the credit of the United States coupon bonds or registered bonds to an amount not exceeding $500,000,000, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years, and payable twenty years from date, and bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable semiannually.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin, and the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862.

That was the pledge of the nation to pay its debt, principal and interest, in coin, which everybody understood at the time to be gold. This pledge was to collect the duties on imports in coin and to set apart the coin so collected in payment of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States and for payment of 1 per cent of the entire debt of the United States annually after July, A. D. 1862. This pledge was made in the darkest hour of the nation's history, and is a component part of its act making paper a legal tender, and the terms "coin" and "gold" were used interchangeably by the lawmakers at that time, and with the general expectation that the interest and the debt would both be paid in gold. Until the last dollar of the Government indebtedness created by that legislation is paid the Government is bound in honor and good faith to pay it in such tenders as its creditors may select at the time of payment.

By these two amendments to the original bill—one made in the Senate without a division, to pay the interest on the bonds in coin; the other to collect the duties on imports in coin, made in conference committee and agreed to unanimously by both Houses—the national currency was in reality kept on a specie basis, and the industries of the country were saved from serious depression, if not entire prostration. Had the duties on imports been collected in this paper money, with nothing to prevent its depreciation except its being legal tender in payment of debts, it would have reduced the rate of duties so it would have resulted in almost free importation of foreign manufactures from all countries, to the great detriment of our home industries.

With the interest on the national debt payable in paper, the capitalist, no matter how patriotic, would have hesitated to part with his money and receive nothing as an income for the support of his family except these paper promises, which would fluctuate in their purchasing power with the uncertainties hanging over the battlefield, and with an additional doubt whether this paper might not possibly in the end become entirely worthless by the excessive issues required by the necessities of the Government itself. But with an income while the conflict might last that could not be destroyed or lessened in its purchasing power, men of wealth were ready to part with their money and trust to the future for the repayment of the principal. Of all the legislation of that period, these two provisions of paying interest in coin and collecting duties in coin were the wisest and the best.

Both came almost by accident, so far as human foresight is concerned. They were not the conception of any one member of either House, but resulted from the disagreement of the two Houses in discussions as to the best method to give the greatest credit to the Government in borrowing money for its then pressing needs.

The provision of the act of February 25, 1862, which requires the interest on the bonds of the United States to be paid in coin receives not a little denunciation from the Democrats and Populist members of the House whenever they have occasion to refer to it. And they freely charge that this provision must have crept into the bill by some lobby influence around these Halls, in the favorite phrase of Populistic orators, of "organized greed"—of bankers and capitalists seeking their own avaricious and selfish gains; and that it was such influences which controlled in the enactment of that legislation.

Sir, the only lobby influence around these Halls when that act passed was a lobby of patriotism. It ill becomes this generation to asperse the memory of the dead or the characters of the living legislators of those times. But they need no vindication in words of eulogy. The far-reaching beneficent results of their acts will be their vindication through all time for wise statesmanship and patriotic devotion to the best interests of their country in that crisis hour of its existence. And the only vindication for unselfish patriotism required for what is known as the "moneyed class" of our citizens at that period is a correct knowledge of the history of their acts. The banks of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, at the first outbreak of the rebellion, loaned the Government $150,000,000 in gold, on the application of Mr. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury.

Justice to this greatly maligned class of American citizens, living and dead, compels me to say in this connection that the promptness and patriotism with which the bankers and the capitalists of the country at that time devoted their wealth to the cause of their country was excelled only by that of the soldier who periled his life on its tented fields.

In support of this declaration I trust the House will pardon me in calling attention to a remarkable instance, not then uncommon except in its degree.

Two war ships were being built on the Clyde, in England, and were almost ready to sail. Charles Francis Adams, then our minister to the Court of St. James, called upon Lord John Russell, secretary of state for Great Britain, with a request, based on the recognized obligations of strict neutrality between belligerents, that an order should be issued by the government preventing the sailing of these cruisers. He presented the evidence, full and complete, which he had procured through his detectives, that the cruisers were built with money furnished by the Confederacy, were to be manned with Confederate sailors, and outside the 3-mile limit were to take aboard their war armament and go forth on their mission of destruction of American commerce upon the high seas.

Lord Russell, after listening patiently to the presentation of the case by Mr. Adams, declined to comply with his request. Mr. Adams, rising from his seat and turning to leave the audience chamber, said (in that sharp, concise tone of voice and with compressed lips, which always characterized him in earnest speech): "I need not remind your lordship this is war."

Next day Mr. Adams received a note from Lord Russell requesting him to call at the foreign office. At their interview Lord Russell said to Mr. Adams that it had been decided to issue the order preventing the sailing of the cruisers, provided he would place in the Bank of England, within forty-eight hours, £1,000,000 sterling in gold, to be held as an indemnity fund against any award of damages that might be obtained against the Government in the court of admiralty.

Mr. Adams returned to his office perplexed and in great doubt what to do; for it seemed impossible for him in this short time to comply with the conditions imposed. The evening shadows of the day scarcely closed in, when a gentleman called at Mr. Adams's residence and said to the servant at the door: "Tell Mr. Adams that a gentleman wishes to see him on strictly private but important business."

In response to this message, Mr. Adams repaired to his reception room and found there George Peabody, then a London banker. Mr. Peabody, addressing Mr. Adams, said:

I know all about your interview to-day with Lord Russell; and realizing how difficult, if not impossible, it would be for you to procure a loan of $5,000,000 in the time specified, even if you had the authority of your own Government, duly authenticated, I have come to say to you that at 10 o'clock to-morrow I will see that $5,000,000 in gold is placed to your credit in the Bank of England on one condition, that it shall be a profound secret how this money is obtained, known only to President Lincoln and such of his officials as must know about it. I will take the bonds of the United States as soon as they can be prepared and sent to you here for delivery in payment of this loan.

Next day Mr. Adams called on Lord Russell and the £1,000,000 sterling in gold was placed on deposit in the Bank of England, as required by Lord Russell, and an order was issued preventing the sailing of these two cruisers.

By this prompt, patriotic act of this millionaire banker the lives and the property of American citizens were saved from destruction upon the wide ocean and the cause of the American Union from impending disasters. And by this act the ruling classes of England were saved from a hatred and rancor in the hearts of the loyal American people deep and bitter as ever burned in the bosoms of the old Continentals against the redcoats and the hiring soldiery of George III.

I judge what would have been the feelings of the American people at that time by my own. Such a national animosity in this period of the world's history between these two English-speaking peoples would have been a calamity to the well-being of the future of mankind scarcely less than would be the dismemberment and destruction of the union of these States.

The Republic owes it to itself some day to erect in front of this Capitol two colossal statues—the one to be inscribed in letters of living light, "George Peabody—the Massachusetts boy, the London banker, the devoted patriot in the hour of his country's greatest need;" the other to be inscribed in characters as enduring as the granite of his native Quincy, "I need not remind your lordship this is war." Such a group to stand through all the years of the long-coming future a memorial of one of the most vital incidents in the history of the new Republic.

But to return from this digression into which I have been led in vindicating the patriotic devotion of all classes of loyal American citizens, including banker, merchant, and capitalist, in the five years of the crisis period of the country's history from 1861, I will call the attention of members to the wording of the act to strengthen the public credit, passed March 18, 1869:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the law by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision, at the earliest practicable period, for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

The act expressly declared that the debt is payable in coin or its equivalent, and it provided that no interest-bearing obligations of the Government shall be redeemed before maturity unless the United States notes are at the time convertible into coin at the option of the holder. What was the reason for any such legislation at that time? For the pledge in the act of February 25, 1862, was specific that the Government would pay the interest on its bonds in coin, and would pay in coin 1 per cent of its entire debt every year after 1862.

Why was this act of 1869 passed? At the time there was neither gold nor silver circulating as money. Specie payments were suspended in November, 1861, and were not resumed until January, 1870. Coin at that time meant gold, or its equivalent. The equivalent was either silver of the commercial value in the markets of the world of $1.29 an ounce, or paper made the equivalent of gold by adding the discount, whatever it might be.

The Greenback party, which sprang into existence in 1867 and 1868, insisted that these bonds were payable in greenbacks at the expiration of five years from the date of their issue; for the reason, they said, that the wording on the face of the bond was that the United States were indebted in dollars, and the wording of the greenback on its face was that the United States promised to pay dollars. Therefore, whenever the time for payment matured, the promise on the greenback to pay dollars, being a legal tender, was good for the payment of these bonds, that on their face called only for dollars, though the law under which they were issued said they should be paid in coin dollars.

To put at rest this question then agitating the public mind, and in order to remove all doubt and settle conflicting questions and interpretations of law by the cheap-money advocates of that time, the act of 1869 was passed, declaring that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment of the national debt in coin or its equivalent.

The wording of the act is that "the faith of the United States is hereby solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent." Could it have been intended in using the word "equivalent" to declare that the silver dollar of the weight of 412½ grains of standard silver, worth in the markets of the world in 1869, when this declaration was made, a little over 100 cents, is the equivalent to the silver dollar of 412½ grains of standard silver, worth in the markets of the world in 1898 from 42 to 45 cents?

The act of July 14, 1870, to authorize the refunding of the national debt, is especially explicit as to the kind of coin in which the debt was to be redeemed, "in coin of the present standard value;" that is, of the standard value of July 14, 1870. At that time the silver dollar was equal in commercial value to the gold dollar, and each was of the value of 100 cents. There is nothing said in this act, or any other law, about weight being an equivalent to value.

Yet all the advocates of paying the bonds of the Government in silver claimed that the weight of 412½ grains of standard silver is equivalent at all times to 100 cents in value, making no distinction between debt-paying value and commercial value, and ignoring entirely the words of the act of July 14, 1870, which are, "Redeemable in coin of the present standard value." At that time the standard value of coin was equivalent and equal to gold; silver and gold dollars were then of the same commercial and debt-paying value.

Treasury notes of 1890, issued in payment for the purchases of silver bullion, are in specific terms payable in either gold or silver at the option of the Government. If the Government has the option of tenders rightfully in paying its debts, what necessity was there for so specifying in this case? It was thought by those who advocated it that as it was silver received, it was fair and right to pay in the same kind of money; and for that reason it was specifically provided that the Government had the option. And the only reason urged at that time why the Government should have the option was that it was paying in just the kind of money it received.

But for the act of Congress pledging the good faith of the Government to keep all kinds of money—gold, silver, and paper—on a parity with each other, the Treasury notes of 1890 might be paid in silver coin. But these notes, being in every way exceptional in character, stand by themselves in every respect an exception to the general rule. There is not a bond of the United States to-day, and there never has been one except those issued in aid of the Pacific railroads, nor is there any other obligation of the Government, not specifying a specific kind of payment, that the Government is not bound in good faith and fair, honest, business dealing to pay at maturity in legal-tender money at the option of the creditor, if the Government has more than one kind of tender, at the time of payment.

Mr. MCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE].

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I hoped some member of the Committee on Ways and Means would fully explain to the House the effect and purpose of this bill, but up to this time we have heard nothing which to my mind ought to be accepted by the House as a reason for passing it. I find, however, on examination of the report, the reason why it is presented:

It has been shown as one reason for the passage of this bill that there are greatly more spirits in the warehouses than there is any demand for in the markets, and that all of them which are over four years old are rapidly depreciating in value, though getting better in quality, because the outage period does not now extend to them.

At a time like this, when the Government is in need of revenue and is calling for people to enlist in the Army and taxing every possible subject of taxation throughout the country except the trusts, corporations, and the incomes of the rich, it seems to me it is a bad time to directly or indirectly relieve the whisky distillers of the country of a part of the tax imposed upon them. The report says:

If it be the policy to paralyze this great revenue producer, all that is needed is to leave the law as it is and the work will be effectually done; but as the revenue is greatly needed and as it can come from no other source which will be so little felt, the committee have deemed it wise to recommend that the relief offered by this bill should be afforded.

Relief to whom? It is not a revenue bill, but a bill to relieve the large distillers.

I am surprised at this statement in the report from the committee presided over by the able and eminent gentleman from Maine, the chairman of the committee, because I had always understood it was the purpose of the lawmakers of that State to suppress the liquor traffic rather than to encourage it. Continuing, the report says:

The results of having a bonded period of eight years and an outage period of only four years have not only been disappointing, but threaten, as will be seen hereafter, serious disaster to the trade and to the revenues.

As correctly and practically applied to the subject of the taxation, the law is wholly incongruous and unsuitable.

Shall we, because the act of 1894 has been disappointing and threatens disaster to the whisky trade, pass this bill? The whisky trade is as able to bear the burdens of this war as any other branch of trade.

If it is incongruous and unsuitable to have a bonded period of eight years and an outage period of only four years, then I suggest that the incongruity can be removed in another way than the one suggested by the committee. Instead of increasing the outage period from four to seven years, and reducing the bonded period to seven years, why not reduce the bonded period to four years, and thereby require an earlier payment of the tax on this large amount of whisky which they say is stored up by the great distilleries, so that the Government can get it at a time that we need money so badly?

Mr. BERRY. Does the gentleman think a man ought to pay for the goods taken out of bond before he gets them ready for the market?

Mr. McRAE. I think he ought to pay on whisky when it is made.

Mr. BERRY. You do not do it with any other article.

Mr. McRAE. I am not familiar with the practice in that respect, but we do and should treat whisky differently from other items of internal tax. Four years was for a long time supposed to be the proper period for whisky to age. Up to the passage of the act of 1894 only three years was allowed as the bonded period.

It was argued, and insisted with great force, as I remember the debate on that question, that by extending the bonded period to eight years a better article would be had, because the whisky would enhance in value and do nobody an injury. But now these same gentlemen come here, after obtaining the concession which enabled them to continue their whisky in bond four years longer, and ask the Government to stand the loss of evaporation for three years. In other words, they ask the Government to wait seven years after the whisky is made for the tax, and demand a discount of 2 gallons a year on each barrel in bond because it does wait.

Mr. BERRY. In other words, the whisky men only want to pay for the amount of whisky in the barrel when they sell it, and not for the amount that has evaporated?

Mr. McRAE. The Government does not propose to keep a warehouse to store liquors until the whisky men are able to sell them. The tax is upon the manufacture of whisky and not on the sale of it. The manufacturers are given a reasonable time to age it, which for a long time was supposed to be three years.

Mr. SHUFORD. Is not this virtually a loan by the Government to the whisky men?

Mr. McRAE. I construe it to be nothing else. It is simply an extension of time for the payment of money due under the law from these distillers, who will pay the tax at the end of four years unless the Government will bear the loss of evaporation, which is more than the interest on the money. I enter my protest against it. I believe it is all wrong, and I hope the House will defeat the bill unless it is changed as I have suggested.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the House what the present law is and what this bill proposes to do. Under the present law a man who makes fruit brandy, or makes whisky, can put it in a bonded warehouse, and it is not to be taken out by him, unless he desires, for eight years. But after the expiration of four years they do not allow any deduction for evaporation. The condition is, at the end of four years, as I have stated, although the whisky may evaporate two gallons per barrel every year, this Government allows no deduction for the two gallons that evaporated after the end of four years.

Now, the United States is the only Government in the world that taxes whisky that does not require the payment of the tax at the time the whisky is consumed. Germany and France and all other nations in the world that collect taxes on goods collect at the time of the consumption of the article. This Government does it for everything else except whisky. On tobacco the manufacturer is not required to pay the tax until it is ready for consumption, and he then pays tax on the amount he ships out for consumption.

Now, the difficulty in connection with the whisky trade is that we do not let our whisky remain in the bonded warehouse long enough for it to get good and mellow. Consequently we do not secure the best whisky, and hence we have a large importation of good foreign whisky. Scotch whiskies are imported, and whiskies of various kinds. Why? Because in England, in France, in Germany, and other countries, the distiller of whisky is allowed to keep his whisky in bond for twenty, thirty, or forty years, and not pay the tax until he takes it out of bond. Thus a good quality of whisky is secured. But in this country we cease at the end of four years to allow any deduction for evaporation. Consequently our distillers are not disposed to let their whisky remain in bond for any longer period.

Besides, at the end of the fourth year, when the deduction on account of evaporation ceases, a great deal of our whisky is imported to Great Britain, Germany, and other countries, and then at the end of seven, eight, or nine years, when all the fusel oil has evaporated and you have a pure article not deleterious to health like whisky raw and new, it comes back here, and under the law when it reaches New York it pays a tax upon the quantity in the barrel, precisely what this bill provides for.

The gentleman says that this bill proposes practically a loan to the distiller. Sir, the man who has his whisky in a bonded warehouse has his capital invested. He is losing the interest on his money. All that this bill proposes is at the end of seven years to allow a gauger of the Government to ascertain the amount of whisky in the barrel, and then the Government is to collect tax for every particle of whisky which that gauging shows. Why not do that in regard to tobacco? Why should you not as well require a man to prepay his tax on goods imported into this country; why not require the tobacco manufacturer to prepay the tax, if you are going to compel the whisky manufacturer to do it? Why hold the scales of justice differently for one man from what you do for another? Why should we not apply those Democratic principles, equality and justice? Why should we say that one class of manufacturers or one branch of industry shall be separated and isolated because you happen to have some prohibition ideas or convictions?

Mr. McRAE. But you propose an extension of the bonded period for the benefit of the distiller.

Mr. SWANSON. I say it is not an extension of the bonded period; there is only an extension of the period for regauging, which makes the Government get tax on every particle of whisky in the barrel.

Mr. BAILEY. Does not this practically reduce the period?

Mr. SWANSON. It reduces the period for payment one year. That is the compromise effected in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has expired.

Mr. SWANSON. I trust I may be allowed a few minutes more.

Mr. EVANS. I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. And I will yield him two minutes of my time.

Mr. SWANSON. Under the present law a man may keep his whisky in the bonded warehouse for eight years and the Government can not compel the payment of the tax until the end of that time. This reduces the time within which the tax must be paid one year.

A MEMBER. And if he does not pay the tax at the time fixed he suffers a loss?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; he suffers a loss. We provide in this bill that the Government shall get its money one year earlier than now, and that the distiller shall be allowed a deduction of three years for evaporation. Is not that a fair and just compromise? The Government gets its money one year earlier than under the present law, and the distiller gets simply an extension of about three years for evaporation. The largest part of the evaporation occurs during the first four or five years.

Mr. SHUFORD. Is any privilege of this kind extended to the farmer?

Mr. SWANSON. A similar privilege is extended to the farmer who manufactures fruit brandy. In my district I believe there are three or four hundred of these farmers who distil brandy from fruit. Such a distiller can put his brandy in a special bonded warehouse and allow it to stay there for seven years, getting mellow and good. Thus we can produce as good peach or apple brandy as can be produced in foreign countries. Do you want to deprive the farmers of that privilege?

A MEMBER. Are those distillers farmers?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; they are farmers. All of those who make fruit brandy in my district are farmers. There are no large distillers in my district.

Mr. SHUFORD. How does the production of brandy there compare with other products of the farm?

Mr. SWANSON. Well, it is a pretty large industry in my district, where there are plenty of peaches and apples.

How can we expect Americans to compete with foreigners in the production of good whisky and brandy unless we allow our own manufacturers or distillers a fair opportunity for their products to become mellow and good?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS].

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I would say to Spain as Burke said to Parliament upon the question of the conciliation of the American colonies:

It is not a question with me whether you have the right to render your people miserable, but whether it is not your interest to make them happy.

The world knows why Burke uttered these words, and we also know that English injustice, oppressive taxation, and coercion continued until finally, unable to stand these injuries, the colonies revolted and threw off the English yoke. So, to-day, while not denying the legal—not the moral—right that Spain has to make her people of Cuba miserable, we must, at the same time, also recognize the right of the Cubans to throw off that yoke of misery, of horror, of injustice, to win the blessings of liberty and equal rights.

I believe that the four greatest curses the world has ever known are famine, pestilence, war, and Spanish colonial rule. While it is not my purpose to enlarge upon all Spanish rule, I do desire to review that rule on the Island of Cuba.

I desire to say first of all, Mr. Chairman, that it is the aim of every man in public life to-day to so conduct himself during this history-making epoch of the nation that the world of to-day and posterity of the future will say that humanity demanded, justice compelled, and honor forced American intervention for the freedom of the struggling patriots on the Island of Cuba, and also for the general welfare of our own people.

It was said by a famous United States Senator that the sufferings of the American people prior to the Revolutionary war were "as dust in the balance" compared to the sufferings of the Cubans during the past eighty years.

The American Revolution and its successful termination was the signal of freedom to many of the possessions of Spain upon this hemisphere. Chile, Peru, Mexico, Venezuela, and United States of Colombia all sooner or later won their freedom, and it seemed as though Cuba, too, would be lost to her.

This, however, was not to be, for her fairest jewel, her "pearl of the Antilles," remained unswervingly true, until at last the world knew her as "faithful Cuba." Despite this, Spain had not sufficient gratitude to say to the people of this island, We will give you such reforms, such liberality of government, that you will be practically free.

What, then, did she do? Ah! With that Machiavelian policy of treachery for which she was and is so famous, her fairest promises were but twisted sword thrusts of far greater wrongs and cruelties.

In 1823 martial law for the government of the island was instituted, the will of the Governor-General being made absolutely supreme upon every question, the Crown never interfering in any manner. The people were to have no voice in the election of their legislators (this is practically so to-day), all being appointed by the Crown, and for protection of their rights they had to rely entirely upon Spanish whims and cruelties. Schools were not started and free education is to this day practically an unknown quantity. Cuba had to pay the entire cost of the invasion of Mexico, amounting to $10,000,000, and in later years the entire cost of putting down the San Domingan insurrection, and the ten years' war, amounting to $23,000,000 and $400,000,000, respectively. As though this were not enough, extra taxes were levied for all sorts of purposes, and it is true that the per capita tax of each resident or subject of Spain upon the island is nearly three times as heavy as that of the Spaniard in Spain.

Is it any wonder that in the early part of the century discontent and dissatisfaction were soon apparent? Spain had broken her pledges, and in 1823 her people revolted. This insurrection, however, did not last long. It was followed by several others until the famous Lopez-Walker troubles of 1848-1852. To this insurrection or raid I propose to allude to some extent, not because of its importance to Cuba, but because of the many valuable state documents written by Presidents Taylor and Fillmore and Secretaries Clayton and Webster, showing our policy toward Spain at this period, and in addition because these state papers are so similar to many, many others written by nearly every other President and Secretary of State from that period to the present time.

These expeditions were supposed to have been organized at Mobile, Ala., in 1849 by a man named White, acting for Lopez and Walker.

The United States acted with dispatch and decision and the Secretary of State, Mr. Clayton, ordered the most rigid investigation, stating that the persons organizing such expeditions were guilty of "high misdemeanor" and subject to a heavy fine and imprisonment.

He also wrote to the United States authorities at New York in relation to a supposed expedition from that city:

If this expedition proves to be against Cuba, proceed by every means in your power to enforce the laws and prevent the violation of our treaty with Spain.

August 11, 1849, President Taylor issued a proclamation in relation to these expeditions, warning "all citizens of the United States that such an enterprise (aiding Cubans) would be a gross violation of our laws and treaty obligations." In no unmistakable manner he declares that the "United States will hold all citizens to account for any violation of our neutrality laws." Two days after this proclamation the President received a letter from the Spanish minister, Calderon de la Barca, protesting against this supposed "expedition of adventurers" against Cuba. This was replied to by Mr. Clayton, Secretary of State, with:

The United States wholly disapproves and condemns the designs referred to, and that it will earnestly and in good faith do all that lies within its power to defeat those designs, and the United States will keep strict watch over any attempt on the part of any of its citizens against the island of Cuba.

The Spaniards, then, too, as now, must have exhibited a great bitterness of feeling against all Americans, for our consul in Cuba urged us to send a naval squadron to protect lives of Americans, as they were seriously endangered.

A few months later this same consul wrote from Santiago de Cuba to the Secretary of State that the people of Cuba are now loud in their grateful applause of the Government at Washington for arresting invasion against Cuba. I presume the particular arrest here alluded to was that of two vessels, one the Sea Gull, with munitions of war, and the other the New Orleans, with men and arms, as they were about to clear from lower quarantine in New York Bay. This destroyed the first filibustering expedition from New York. Eternal vigilance is certainly the price of preservation of neutrality laws.

Taking the evidence of the Spanish minister at this time (1849), it is most clearly shown that this revolution in Cuba would have been very extensive and difficult to suppress had it not been for the prompt action of President Taylor and Secretary Clayton.

The Spanish minister "placed implicit reliance upon our attempt to stop all expeditions against Cuba." Later, among other protests was one, in May, 1850, against the flag that was raised by the New York Sun over its New York building, claiming that the Sun had called this the flag of the Cuban Republic, and insisted that the owners of the Sun be required to furnish bail to keep the peace and from disturbing the public mind. There is nothing to show in the archives of the State Department whether the Sun was placed under bonds, but it does prove to me that the Sun was the original "Cuba Libre," "Jingo" newspaper in the United States. I simply would add, "Good for the Sun."

On May 10, 1850, the Spanish minister wrote a most threatening letter to Secretary of State Clayton about an expedition that was supposed to have left New York. He said that "if these pirates," as he called them, "received deserved chastisement, no matter how hard or severe, no interposition in their favor shall be listened to; neither will the sympathy which they may inspire have any foundation; nor will any complaint or claim be considered just." Mr. Chairman, knowing how hard and earnestly our Government was working to preserve our laws of neutrality, this letter seems to me to be one of the most unnecessarily severe ever received by our State Department.

SPANISH DIPLOMACY IS NOT OF A GENEROUS AND OPEN ORDER.

May 18, 1850, Secretary Clayton replied that "the United States had always used its best exertions to put down former disturbances, and would do the same in the present emergency."

Lopez landed with 400 men at Cardenas May 19, 1850, and after thoroughly defeating a small Spanish force retreated to his ships. (It is a peculiar coincidence that the place where the first battle of Cuban filibusters was fought against Spanish troops is also where American troops and sailors were first in contest with Spaniards.)

After this battle the Count of Alcoz, Governor-General of Cuba, declared Cuba—

I. In a state of siege.

II. Coasts of the island and its waters were declared in a state of siege, and all vessels whose papers were not all right would be searched, and whenever arms or munitions of war were found the vessel and her sailors would be treated as pirates.

III. All persons detected in belonging to band were to be immediately shot.

IV. All people found associating with any member of the "band of robbers" (so called) would be shot.

V. Anyone aiding them in any manner with news, arms, money, provisions, or doing any service would be shot.

VI and VII were equally as severe. It is also true that the entire edict was so cruel and barbarous that all the inhabitants were afraid and suspicious of each other. The suffering it caused was certainly tremendous, and is it to be wondered that the Cuban patriots dreaded taking up arms against Spain when defeat meant certain death?

Lopez in his pronunciamiento simply said the rebellion was "to liberate the people of Cuba from the tyranny and oppression to which they are now subject by the power of Spain."

To revert, two days after the battle at Cardenas the Spanish newspapers in Havana recorded in most patriotic language the great victory of the Spanish troops, when in reality it was a disgraceful defeat. Their journalism of to-day differs very little from that of fifty years ago. I desire to quote part of the editorial of one of these papers, the Diario de la Marina, in order to show the very accurate, prophetic discernment of its editor:

From this day the Queen of the Antilles will march secure of her future by the road of prosperity that has been opened to her by the protecting hand of our sovereign and the solicitude, tact, and care of the authorities that so well govern us.

The world knows the truth of this prophecy, and time shows the paragraph should have read as follows:

From this day the Queen of the Antilles will march insecure of her future by the road of adversity that has been forced upon her by the treacherous hand of her sovereign and the inhumanity, errors, and criminal neglect of the authorities that so wickedly and outrageously govern us.

June 1, 1850, President Taylor sent a message to Congress in response to a request from the Senate to the State Department "for all information and correspondence upon an alleged revolutionary movement in the Island of Cuba." With this message was sent a vast amount of correspondence upon the conduct of the United States to Spain in relation to various attempts (to quote from the message) "under the directions of foreigners enjoying the hospitality of this country to get up armed expeditions for the purpose of invading Cuba," and the message concludes by saying: "It will be seen by the correspondence that this Government has been faithful in the discharge of its treaty obligations with Spain and in the execution of the acts of Congress which have for their object the maintenance, in this regard, of the peace and honor of this country."

Time and again the Secretary of State wrote our consuls, marshals, district attorneys, and the Spanish authorities that the President intended to sustain the honor of this Government by the faithful discharge of our obligations toward Spain. At the same time Secretary Clayton refused to recognize the right of Spain to hang, garrote, or shoot any American citizens captured on the high seas in a filibuster. They were unquestionably guilty of a violation of the United States law, but of no law under which Spain could punish them. "The intention to commit crime is not crime. Some overt act must accompany the intent." The President decided that "the eagle shall and must protect them against any punishment but that which the tribunals of their own nation may award." "Warn the Count of Alcocz, Governor-General, in the most friendly manner and in the true spirit of our ancient treaty, that if he unjustly sheds one drop of American blood at this exciting period, it may cost the two nations a sanguinary war."

There is Yankee pluck for you; there is Yankee patriotism; there is protection to American citizens, and it was by such men as Secretary Clayton and President Taylor and documents similar to theirs that the United States is great and powerful to-day. No beating around the bush to avoid war, but everything for national honor and protection to our citizens, ashore or afloat.

The Navy Department cooperated with the State Department, and gave many explicit orders to our naval commanders to prevent expeditions leaving the United States, and, in addition to this, a strict patrol was kept between New Orleans and Charleston.

Lopez was finally captured and garroted, and with him were garroted or shot a number of poor, misguided, deceived American citizens; and remember, these Americans had not violated any law that was punishable by a severer penalty than fine and imprisonment. They were also entitled, under article 8 of our treaty with Spain, to a fair trial, and as this same article 8 and one similar to it have been referred to so many times of late, I quote it in its entirety, viz:

And, in all cases of seizure, detention, or arrest contracted or offense committed by any citizen or subject of the one party within the jurisdiction of the other, the same shall be made and prosecuted by order and authority of law only, and according to the regular course of proceedings usual in such cases.

The citizens and subjects of both parties shall be allowed to employ such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors as they may be concerned before the tribunals of the other party; and such agents shall have free access to be present at the proceedings in such cases and at the taking of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited at the said trials.

To revert to the Lopez massacre, it was said and proved that the most revolting and barbarous indignities and mutilations were committed on the bodies of these Americans after their assassination.

On August 21, 1851, a terrible riot in New Orleans was caused by the arrival at that city of the steamer Crescent City from Havana with letters from executed men, written prior to execution, to friends in New Orleans. A Spanish newspaper office was demolished and destroyed, the Spanish consulate looted and attacked, and Spanish stores robbed and burned. No one, however, was killed, and in consequence of the fact that Spain, through the conduct and actions of her subjects, was partially responsible for the riot, our Government refused to pay any indemnity excepting for damage at the consulate.

The Spanish minister, writing to our State Department October 14, 1851, said something to this effect: "The action of Spain in Cuba in executing filibusters was just and honorable, and she (Spain) proposed to sustain, at all hazards, the honor of the Castilian flag, that flag without stain," etc., and this, gentlemen, was written after the mutilation of the bodies of the executed men of the Lopez expedition. If this was not a stain upon the flag of Spain, I do not know what could have been; but Spain has ever used fine language in diplomacy, torture and inhumanity in actual treatment of her subjects and prisoners, and utter disregard of all treaty obligations in her dealings with another power.

In every instance of her history with us she has held herself the aggrieved, while in reality she has been the relentless, cruel aggressor, and humanity, acting through the medium of the United States, has frequently been forced to make her desist in the treatment meted out to her subjects. To revert to this famous letter of De la Barca, he informed us also that "unless we desisted, all Americans, including the American consul, would be ordered out of Cuba," at the same time claiming indemnity for destruction of Spanish property. One month later, November 13, 1851, that great statesman, Daniel Webster, then Secretary of State, replied in the most diplomatic language and beautiful satire that "the United States recognized the past greatness and honor of the Castilian flag and the early greatness of Spain; at the same time regretted the action of the mob in New Orleans, but would not pay one dollar of indemnity excepting for property destroyed at Spanish consulate."

De la Barca then endeavored to intimidate Mr. Webster, but found his vaporings had about as much effect upon our great statesman as the ocean has upon the rock-bound coast of Maine. War seemed inevitable, but the episode was hushed up and the Lopez incident declared closed.

The Lopez incident disturbed the "peace and happiness" of our people and upset our "general welfare."

The next source of trouble was the famous Black Warrior case. Spain boarded and searched without warrant of law and in violation of every treaty obligation this vessel for munitions of war when there was not any sign of trouble upon the Island of Cuba. Again the dark war clouds appeared on the horizon, but the sun of diplomacy dissolved them and the episode was declared settled. Thus again was the peace and happiness and general welfare of the American people disturbed.

How about the people in Cuba during all these years? Their condition became more deplorable, taxes became heavier, cruelty grew apace, slavery was in existence all over the island, Spanish thievery diminished not in the least, and finally in 1868 began the war that lasted until 1878 and is known in history as the ten-years war. This war was conducted with the usual Spanish cruelty and inhumanity. I would say the ostensible cause of this was was for the liberation of the slaves, but in reality the cause was for representation in the Spanish Cortes and a reduction in taxation. Peace was finally brought about by Martinez Campos, the Governor-General, promising all reforms asked.

It was during this war that the famous Virginian affair occurred, when so many Americans were foully butchered at Santiago de Cuba. What did President Grant do? He sent an ultimatum demanding that Spain should pay an indemnity, apologize, and salute the American flag, and cowardly Spain, knowing the military ability of General Grant, instantly obeyed orders and did as commanded. War would certainly have resulted had not Spain acceded to President Grant's ultimatum, and it seemed as though it would occur anyway. Thus once more were the peace and happiness and the general welfare of the American people disturbed.

Spain kept but one of her promises to the people of Cuba, their condition becoming more deplorable than ever before. The slaves, it is true, were freed, but the election reforms were a delusion and a snare, free education was a lie, reduced taxation was in reality almost doubly a burden, and finally, in 1895, when several Cuban newspaper editors were deported, mutterings of revolt could be heard at every place where Cubans were wont to congregate. Finally the storm burst and Cuba was again in revolt. While it is true that the ten years' war was a revolution of the lower class, it is equally true the present revolution is one of the better class.

I would say here that the great majority of the doctors, lawyers, and all the professional men and merchants are native Cubans. Remember, too, out of 1,600,000 population there are not more than 150,000 native Spaniards, 400,000 negroes, while the remainder, or over 1,000,000, are native Cubans. This table is from the most accurate source, and the Spanish yarn about two-thirds of the population of Cuba being negroes is, as usual, a Spanish lie.

In the pronunciamiento of the rebels, which is a very strong document, it is said the war is for the purpose of "seeking redress for long-continued wrongs, injuries, and cruelties." From its inception the war has been a success for the patriotic cause, and Spain, as usual, had to finally resort to the butchery of innocent men, women, and children to attempt to stop its ever onward progress. When this availed naught, "Butcher Weyler" was given command and soon was promulgated his famous order of reconcentration. By this order all men, women, and children were ordered to the towns. This was really an order of extermination, Weyler knowing full well that the towns had not provisions and supplies sufficient for their own use, leaving aside the task of supplying thousands more.

The people of the United States could hardly stand these cruelties, and finally when the Maine was destroyed the last straw broke the long-suffering camel's back and war resulted.

But you may say now we had not the right to intervene. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the policy of the United States is the policy of peace until there shall arise a just cause for war. Our commerce with Cuba is large and important, and the records of the diplomatic intercourse between the two countries ought to manifest to Spain how sincerely, how earnestly, the United States has "manifested the hope that no changes of any character might lead to a transfer of Cuba from the Spanish Crown."

If any nation has done all in its power to promote, establish, and maintain amicable relations with Spain, that nation is the United States. Again, I repeat, our records and reports of the State Department are full of the evidences of the distinguished consideration we have had for Spain. It is well to remember that for many years our commerce suffered most severely from attacks of pirates and freebooters whose headquarters were on the islands of Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the shores of Texas, and were finally destroyed, not by Spanish vigilance, but by Yankee gunboats and men-of-war. Yet the United States did not cry out in bullying tones to Spain to suppress these pirates, for she knew that Spain was too exhausted, too poor after her French wars, to maintain a fleet of sufficient size for their destruction.

If we wanted Cuba, then was the time for conquest, for annexation. But no, we were too honorable, too just to strike a nation when it was almost in the last throes of national existence; and going further, we informed Spain that we could not view with friendliness the attempt of any foreign power to take these islands from her. This was our idea of justice, of friendship toward the nation that had no friends to aid, protect, or defend her, and that had so grossly violated her treaty obligations with us. Thank God for our American charity, diplomacy, and policy of malice toward none and justice to all.

Yet some say we are not justified in now acting against Spain. The time had come; the hour was here and America had to act. The naked sword of justice may indeed be now used without disgrace and without criticism. "We can not suffer oblivion to cover the past;" we must remember the history of Cuba. So long as the reconcentrados continued suffering and starving, just so long would efforts constantly have been made by generous and noble-hearted American citizens to alleviate their condition, while the cry "Cuba libre" would strike a responsive chord in the breast of every true lover of American liberty and institutions. So long as Cuba remained a Spanish colony, just so long would it have been a thorn in the side of our body politic, and at periods recurring far too frequently caused us national pain and commercial disquietude.

Can we desire more reasons for intervention? Can we ask for further cause for authorizing the President to use the Army and Navy? Not being a lawyer, I am compelled to rely upon the unchallenged arguments of one of the best lawyers in the House of Representatives for the purpose of giving the legal rights of intervention. This argument in part is as follows:

INTERVENTION FOR FREEDOM AND HUMANITY.

If our right to intervene in Cuba by reason of the injury and disquietude to the United States is clear, it is equally clear that it is our moral duty to secure peace, order, and freedom in Cuba and to succor her starving people. International jurists differ as to the right of nations to intervene on humanitarian grounds, but international jurists do not make law; they simply collect and discuss the precedents which constitute international usage.

If it is said to think of the interventions which have taken place for selfish motives, to establish oppression and stifle the spirit of liberty, it is reassuring to find nations which are strong intervening to save those which are weak, intervening in the name of justice and liberty. Vattel held—

"That a foreign power has a right to succor an oppressed people who implore their assistance, when from good reasons they take up arms against an oppressor, and that it is but an act of justice and generosity to assist brave men in the defense of their liberties."

Sir James McIntosh, in the English Parliament in 1823, said: "Whatever a nation may lawfully defend for itself it may defend for another people if called upon to interpose."

Bluntschli and Wheaton and Woolsey admit the right of intervention for motives of humanity or to aid an oppressed race.

"Intervention—"

Said Sir William Vernon Harcourt—

"when wisely and equitably handled by those who have the power to give effect to it, may be the highest power of justice and humanity."

And again:

"The only object and justification of intervention is peace."

We can not lay down an absolute rule that will cover all cases. Each must be decided on its own merits and our practical relation to it. The massacre of the Armenians by Turkey aroused immense moral indignation in the United States and was the subject of various appeals to our Government by a sympathetic people. Our Government could and did make moral protests to the Turkish Government, but it could not forcibly intervene.

That duty belonged to the five great powers. They had assumed the responsibility of securing good government in Armenia, and it is a blot on the civilization of the nineteenth century that they did not fulfill their duty. Mr. Gladstone's famous appeal will go down to history. Spain is the Turkey of the New World and Cuba is our Armenia, and the people of this country have determined that slaughter and oppression and massacre and starvation shall cease in that island.

The United States Government itself has intervened in the affairs of other nations, and for humane reasons. It gave moral support to the efforts of Hungary to obtain its independence. It has made moral protest in behalf of persecuted Jews. It interposed in 1851 by sending a United States ship to Turkey to bring Hungarian exiles to this country. It has interceded in behalf of political offenders. It interceded for the protection of Venezuela and Mexico.

The United States rendered a service not only to its own citizens, but also to civilization and humanity when they forcibly intervened to break up the piracy of the Barbary powers. There were several American statesmen who thought it cheaper to pay the Barbary powers the yearly tribute they exacted than to fight them; but the result showed that war in this case was cheaper and shorter than peace, and a long and final peace was the blessed result of a short war.

So much for the legal phase. In conclusion, how would our forefathers have acted? Thomas Jefferson said:

We love and value peace. We know its blessings from experience. We abhor the follies of war, and are not untired in its distresses and calamities. Unmeddling with the affairs of other nations, we had hoped that our distance would have left us free in the example and indulgence of peace with the world.

Washington:

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation.

Van Buren, 1838, second message:

That the people of the United States should feel an interest in the spread of political institutions as free as they regard their own to be, is natural, nor can a sincere solicitude for the success of all those who are at any time in good faith struggling for their acquisition be imputed to our citizens as a crime. With the entire freedom of opinion and an undisguised expression thereof on their part, the Government has neither the right, nor, I trust, the disposition, to interfere.

He then goes on to say that whether the United States should interfere is wisely left to Congress. This is exactly what President McKinley did. He waited and then asked Congress, the direct representatives of the States and the people, what should be done. He certainly had warrant enough under a vast amount of historical authority to proceed in this manner, and Congress, knowing full well the desires and wishes of a great majority of the American people, acted in full concordance with their desires.

Webster wrote the following plank in President Fillmore's second message—1851:

The deep interest which we feel in the spread of liberal principles and the establishment of free governments, and the sympathy with which we witness every struggle against oppression, forbid that we should be indifferent to those in which the strong arm of a foreign power is invoked to stifle public sentiment and repress the spirit of freedom in any country.

Nations are equal in their independence and sovereignty, and that each individual state is bound to do unto all other states just what it reasonably expects those states to do unto itself.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that when Spain recognized the beligerency of the South during the civil war, she opened a way for us to do unto her at some time what she did unto us; and I am satisfied that if we had conducted our war with barbarism, murder, and outside the pale of civilized warfare, she would have allowed the independence of the Confederacy, and also would have intervened if necessary to stop the war.

She would have had a notable precedent for such action, as we also have now, namely, the action of Great Britain, France, and Russia in intervening to stop the Turkish atrocities, many years ago, at the time of the Greek insurrection. It was then considered necessary to do this "on the ground of humanity, to stay the effusion of blood." It has been said that—

The emancipation of Greece was a high act of policy, above and beyond the domain of law. As an act of policy, it may have been and was justifiable. (Wharton—Kent and Harcourt.)

We must take the course for our present severe action along these lines, and we are justified in intervening, as Spain would have been under similar conditions.

This being the case, why should our sympathy and assistance be given to this people of the island? Because we are bound to follow the illustrious example of our forefathers—and it should be here remembered that at the close of the Revolutionary war our Government was being conducted under articles of confederation, the Constitution not having been adopted until some years later. This, however, did not deter France from giving the aid and encouragement that we so sorely needed, and at this time I am forcibly reminded of the words of Washington:

Born, sir, in a land of liberty, having early learned its value, having engaged in a perilous conflict to defend it; having, in a word, devoted the best years of my life to secure its permanent establishment in my own country, my anxious recollections, my sympathetic feelings, and my best wishes are irresistibly excited whenever in any country I see an oppressed nation unfurl the banners of freedom.

Admitting, in regard to our relations with foreign governments, that our national policy should be one of noninterference in their domestic affairs, I believe that there must be a few exceptions and objections to the absolute infallibility of this doctrine. Civil war, anarchy, and oppression are some of the exceptions that would justify armed interference or intervention in the domestic affairs of a foreign power.

We must ever maintain the principle that the people of this continent alone have the right to decide their own destiny.—Polk, first message, 1845.

So, believing this, and taking as my guides Washington, Webster, Clay, Monroe, and many other famous men, I am forced to the belief that the people of Cuba have the right to decide their own destiny irrespective of Spain, and it is our duty, if we still love those principles for which our fathers struggled and fought, and through the medium of which we have become the greatest Republic the world has ever known, to say to these Cubans, "Be of good cheer, for we, the people of the United States, propose to help you gain your freedom, in order that you may enjoy the inestimable blessings of free speech, free government, free education, and humane laws, for we know that, downtrodden and crushed and inhumanly treated as you have been, you could not develop. Aye, we will assist you along the path of national greatness, we will protect you from foreign invasion, we will comfort you in your hours of adversity, and now extend to you the right hand of fellowship and strength, saying, 'Welcome, thou Pearl of the Antilles, into the sisterhood of North American republics.'"

You say, This means war! So be it; for honorable and justifiable war is infinitely better than national cowardice. Oh, ye of little courage, have you forgotten the Maine, or her gallant crew who were so foully slaughtered in that Spanish harbor? Aye, the eagle is ruffled and the American people have volunteered and are ready to rush to the front in answer to his shrill call to uphold the national honor and help free Cuba from Spanish thralldom.

This idea of our remembering the rights of Spain should not be considered. Time and time again we have submitted to her insults; time and time again we have protected her island from falling into the hands of foreign powers. Has she forgotten our kindness to her in 1823, 1825, 1890, 1848, 1851 to 1853?

If she has, we have not. It seems to me that some nations do not know how to hold their friends or how to heed their advice. "A nation has justification for war while admitted wrongs remain unredressed." So as we have not had redress for our injured commerce and martyred sailors, we were compelled to give Spain the opportunity no longer to continue her course against us.

John Quincy Adams said:

There is a stage in every revolutionary contest when the party struggling for independence has a right to demand its acknowledgment.

Not so much a question of interest, but of feeling for that cause of liberty we love so well. When a sovereign can not maintain his authority over his people, they—the people—certainly have a right to choose their own government. I think we are all willing to admit that "voluntary agreement is the only legitimate source of authority among men, and that all just government is a compact," and we are ready to go a step further and say that Spain had not the remotest chance to subdue her recalcitrant subjects; and also agreeing that our Government is founded upon the doctrines of humanity and the inalienable right of man to be governed by just and equitable laws, made by himself for himself, based upon the doctrine of equal rights and equal privileges and not upon no rights and exclusive privileges (which is now the style of government in Cuba), then we absolutely must believe and are compelled to acknowledge that Spanish rule in Cuba can no longer continue and the people have the right to be free.

In addition to this we can not be indifferent to the sufferings of the innocent reconcentrados on the Island of Cuba. America remonstrated at the cruelties that were being perpetrated upon the Armenians, and to-day we have within but a few miles of our own shores sufferings compared to which the Armenian atrocities were as naught. And were not inhumanity, cruelty, and destruction of property in Cuba proper conditions to influence action of Congress and the American people? Knowing what we owe to the cause of liberty and free government and to the principle of lawful resistance to oppression and tyranny, in the language of Webster—

Does it not become us, then—is it not a duty imposed upon us, to give our weight to the side of liberty and justice; to let mankind know that we are not tired of our own institutions?

We could not and would not allow this cruel, inhuman struggle between Spain and Cuba to continue; for it meant not only the absolute devastation of the island, but the annihilation of this people, who have the right to govern themselves. Therefore, in the name of humanity and through the right of "providing for our own general welfare," we were justified in armed intervention.

The members of the National Legislature intrusted with the honor of the nation should strive, at all hazards, to preserve peace and promote commercial prosperity; at the same time, however, they ought never to think of securing either at a price so dear as that of national disgrace.

In the study of history we will find one truth more clearly taught than any other, and it is that a nation, great or small, to be honored at home or abroad, to have the respect of its own people, or to hold its position of strength among the great powers, must ever guard, defend, and protect its national honor, must bear about it a spirit to resent and when necessary an arm to repel an affront, insult, or injury, come from what quarter it may.

It matters not what its resources may be, the size of its standing or volunteer army, the number of battle ships riding quietly at ease in some well protected harbor, what vast amount may be stowed away in a nation's treasury, if the sense of national honor be lacking or if it be weakened from luxury and ease growing out of national prosperity or from submission to wrongs or indignities from others, that nation has taken its first step toward retrogression and must soon become the sport and the scorn of every respectable power. And, Mr. Chairman, it is as true as Holy Writ that when we have lost the respect of our peers we soon forfeit our own self-esteem and are rushing headlong to an abyss of degradation and dependence, to end in imbecility and national death.

What course, then, should we, the nation's representatives, pursue? I believe, sir, we should make an individual case of each case to be determined, assuming the position of the nation, based absolutely upon its Constitution, guided entirely by its laws, surrounded by its treaty stipulations, laden with its duties and obligations to all mankind, and having determined what line of conduct should be individually adopted, let that be "the guide to our reason and the lamp to our feet."

Duty belongs to man; consequences rest with a higher power.

From 1812 to 1898 our whole intercourse with Spain over the Island of Cuba has been marked with a spirit of domination on her part and patient and friendly endurance upon ours. Conscious of our superiority in physical greatness and resources, intellectual culture, civil liberty, and in everything which tends to give lasting duration to a government, power to a nation, or happiness to individuals, we have kept down and held in check that spirit of resentment which sprung up at each successive trespass and infringement on our rights, even at the hazard, peace-loving as we are, of being charged by the world with cowardice, in hopes that a returning sense of justice would convince the Spanish Government of the utter fatuity, folly, and blindness of her course. Most of the wars that have deluged nations in blood have had their origin in causes far less offensive than those which we have suffered from Spain.

Our nation is awake, and upon every side can now be heard:

My country: May you ever be right, but right or wrong, my country for ever.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does that include the time the gentleman from Kentucky yielded to me?

The CHAIRMAN. That was taken out of his time.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY].

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman, I never thought that legislation ought to be based upon prejudice, and it seems to me that a tax of seven or eight hundred per cent more than its value upon the chief product of my State is unreasonable and unjust, and only founded upon the prejudice of the people of this country against the man who now and then takes more whisky than he ought to have. The distillers of Kentucky contribute about $18,000,000 a year to the taxes of this Government. The object of this bill, as I apprehend it, is to give to the manufacturer an opportunity to allow his goods to ripen and mature and become a wholesome drink for the average American citizen who imbibes in that direction. I do not think a few temperance men in this country ought to control and direct legislation alone upon the idea of prejudice against an article which sometimes induces men to get drunk.

This bill interests not only the whisky manufacturer, but it interests the farmer whose grain is used in the manufacture of the liquor. It interests the thousands of coopers who are engaged in the manufacture of the barrels, and it interests the many others who are directly or indirectly concerned in the production of this article before it reaches the markets of the world.

Under the law as it is now, the man who carries his liquor abroad and holds it in a foreign port under foreign insurance and in a foreign warehouse, or in a foreign vessel, is not taxed with the evaporation which takes place during that time, but when he keeps it in this country beyond a certain limited time he is taxed upon the evaporation, and I say that is an unfair proposition.

If a man takes a hundred barrels of whisky from my State and carries it to the Bermudas and puts it into a warehouse there and brings it back at the end of three years, the Government, knowing each one of those barrels by its designated number, when it comes back into this country does not tax the man for the whisky which has evaporated, even if 20 gallons have gone out of each barrel by evaporation. But if the whisky is retained in the United States in a bonded warehouse he is compelled to pay a tax upon each and every gallon evaporated after a specific time. Why should a man be required to pay a tax upon an article that he is going to sell to the public until he is ready to sell it?

The real fact is that the whisky has not gone through the entire process of manufacture and been made a drinkable article until it is six or eight years old. That time is required to mature it, and the man who drinks whisky that is two or three years old drinks it at the risk of his system and the destruction of his stomach. It is not mature whisky, ready for consumption, until it is six or eight years old.

Now, last year in the State of Kentucky a bushel of corn was not worth more than 25 cents. I believe it is worth a little more now under the Dingley bill. Last year, when it sold for 25 cents, we could get 5 gallons of whisky out of a bushel of corn. Yet you tax those 5 gallons of whisky $5.50 under the existing law, and you compel a man to pay that tax before he is ready to put the article upon the market and get some return upon it. What is the effect? Nearly every great whisky-distilling concern in the Commonwealth of Kentucky has been broken up in the last few years.

Down in the Owensboro district one of the largest concerns in Kentucky has been destroyed. Three or four distilleries in Louisville and others in Lexington and in Frankfort have gone to pieces. When they consented to the increase of the bonded period and the tax was raised from 90 cents to $1.10 a gallon they went into the banks and pledged their whisky, and when the money became due and they were not able to pay it the banks squeezed them. The consequence was that they went to the wall. There is hardly a great distillery in Kentucky to-day which has not suffered from the increased tax. Now, what do they ask? Simply that when the whisky is ready for the market they shall pay their tax, and not before, and that they shall not pay a tax upon that which is lost by evaporation.

Why, when the whisky is placed in a bonded warehouse it is under lock and key in the hands of the Government all the time. Not a drop can be taken out unless the agent of the Government is there. Why should we be made to pay for the whisky while the evaporation is going on, while it is in process of maturing so as to make it a desirable drink for the human system? I think the proposition in this bill is fair, and I believe every man in this House ought to favor the bill.

Why, under the Dingley bill, about which we had so much talk, most other articles are taxed about 40 or 45 per cent, yet whisky is taxed seven or eight hundred per cent. I ask you, is it fair to tax us at that rate on the whisky which is allowed to evaporate in order to make the remainder a good, drinkable article? It is in the interests of the American people that the whisky which is consumed in this country should be mature and wholesome.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I believe the time on the other side has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has all been exhausted except one minute, which was not reserved.

Mr. EVANS. Does the gentleman from New York desire to consume that one minute?

Mr. Chairman, I believe that every member of the committee who will consider the bill from the standpoint of the Government and the standpoint of the other parties in interest will see that the Ways and Means Committee have reached a wise conclusion, one that will be beneficial to the Government as well as to the private individuals concerned. The important fact is that when the tax was increased to $1.10 a gallon and the bonded period was extended to eight years, the production of whisky in a short time diminished possibly 70 per cent; that is, the gross product of bourbons and ryes in 1893 was over 57,000,000 gallons and in 1897 only 10,400,000 gallons. Now, I do not think it is for the interest of the Government that this great revenue producer should be so hindered by the legislation of Congress. The result indicated has been largely increased by the excessive taxation upon it, but it is also considerably contributed to by the anomalous condition of the law, which gives an eight-year bonded period and allows for outage only four years. These outages result from the necessary process of manufacturing the spirits.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like an opportunity to extend my remarks in the RECORD so as to embrace the report of the committee on this subject. That report was carefully prepared. It is too long to be read at length, but I will put it into the RECORD, so that all who desire to know the facts may have access to them. If there be no objection, I will incorporate the report as a part of my remarks, so that this question can be fully presented in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to incorporate the report of the committee as a part of his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report of the Committee on Ways and Means (by Mr. EVANS) is as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, having carefully considered the bill (H. R. 10233) to amend the internal-revenue laws relating to distilled spirits, and for other purposes, recommend that the same be passed.

This bill is the final outcome of the consideration which the committee have given to certain phases of the internal-revenue laws relating to distilled spirits, and to which several bills introduced at the present session have directed attention.

In their efforts to reach a proper conclusion the committee have been greatly assisted by the Internal Revenue Office.

Some of the bills referred to proposed to reduce to a greater or less extent the rate of tax on distilled spirits, but while the present rate is certainly high, and in the estimation of many extremely so, being at least 700 per cent on the original cost of production of the finest and most expensive spirits, and ranging from that to about 1,300 per cent on the cost of producing the cheapest grades, yet in view of the present war conditions, and the necessity of now imposing taxation upon many other articles, the committee have not considered it wise or expedient at this time to favor the proposition to lower the tax rate on spirits, although in his carefully prepared letter of May 5, 1897, addressed to the President of the Senate in reply to a resolution of that body (Senate Document No. 72, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session), the present Secretary of the Treasury used the following language:

"Third. What rate of tax will, in the judgment of the Secretary, produce the greatest amount of revenue consistent with the protection of the honest manufacturer and dealers?"

"In considering this question I submit the following table, which shows the revenue-producing results under the several rates of taxation on distilled spirits since the establishment of the present internal-revenue system:

"This table would indicate that the highest revenue-producing rate was 70 cents per gallon."

That the condition of the distilled-spirits business is bad, and that it is such as will not yield to the United States the best and most satisfactory results in revenue, and certainly not such as it would yield in a healthy condition, are facts which are not only admitted by all who are acquainted with the subject, but which are demonstrated by the official figures, which will presently follow. Of course the interest of the United States in the subject is that of revenue only, and it would be a shortsighted policy for the Government, by unwise or oppressive legislation, to crush out the energetic men who have invested immense sums in a business which of late years has been very much more profitable to the Government than it has been to them. That disaster is impending over the business, and that such a result will most injuriously affect the revenues, is apparent from the great falling off in production since the present law went into effect. The quantities of spirits produced in each year from 1890 to 1897, inclusive, are as follows:

As further showing the condition of the business and its effect upon the revenue, the following official figures are given:

Quantity, in taxable gallons, of spirits produced and deposited, etc.—Cont'd.

Falling off in receipts during thirty months, from September 1, 1894	969,251.57
Receipts from fermented liquors during the thirty months—

Percentage loss in receipts from—
Distilled spirits	16.95
Tobacco	1.64
Fermented liquors	1

These figures, per se, demonstrate the danger, which, in the near future, will threaten as well the manufacturer of spirits as the revenues of the country, for without the production of the spirits the revenues are lost, and unless there is left some margin or prospect of profit to the manufacturer, he can not continue the business. If it be the policy to paralyze this great revenue producer, all that is needed is to leave the law as it is and the work will be effectually done; but as the revenue is greatly needed and as it can come from no other source which will be so little felt, the committee have deemed it wise to recommend that the relief offered by this bill should be promptly afforded.

The present anomalous condition of the law respecting the time which distilled spirits may remain in bond in order to perfect their manufacture into the best article, and respecting the maximum allowance which may be made for those losses from evaporation or leakage which are necessary incidents to that manufacture, has worked very great injustice and injury to the trade without any advantage to the Government.

Under the act of 1894 the tax rate was increased from 90 cents per gallon to $1.10—a raise of 20 per cent on the rate and an increase of over 130 per cent on the original cost of production of the subject of the taxation. As some compensation for this great increase, the same act extended the bonded period from three years to eight years, but only extended the period during which there might be an allowance made for losses by evaporation, etc., and which will hereafter be called the outage period, from three years to four years, although that evaporation was certain to continue during the whole eight-year bonded period, however carefully the spirits may have been warehoused and guarded, because it is a continuous work of nature.

The bonded period was given upon the ground that it takes the time to perfect the manufacture of the goods. Yet under the present law the spirits lost beyond the possibility of recovery by the evaporation which takes place during the last four years of the bonded period must pay the tax precisely as if still on hand, ready to go into the market. This change of law by the act of 1894 was a new and untried experiment. No one could or did foresee how it would work. The results of having a bonded period of eight years and an outage period of only four years have not only been disappointing, but threaten, as will be seen hereafter, serious disaster to the trade and to the revenues.

As correctly and practically applied to the subject of the taxation the law is wholly incongruous and unsuitable.

The committee has knowledge of no fact which justifies having a bonded period of one length of time and an outage period of another. The two should correspond. Practical experience has fully shown that the two periods should be coincident and coextensive, and the principal object of this bill is to accomplish that result.

The most startling and unexpected effect of this condition of the law is the unquestioned fact that it discriminates against spirits more than four years old, and in so doing ruinously diminishes their value. Although those spirits are older and better and intrinsically more valuable, yet because of that discrimination they can not be sold in the market for as much as those of the same make and brand which are less than four years old, and this for the reason that the purchaser knows in one case what his allowance for outage will be when he shall come to take his goods out of bond, and in the other he does not.

Hence the fact was clearly proved to the committee that fine whiskies distilled in 1892 and 1893 can not be sold in the market for as much by 10 to 20 cents per gallon as the whiskies of the same make manufactured in 1895. The productions of the years just previous to 1894, as the figures already given show, were very large, and this immense depreciation in their value by reason of this incongruous state of the law threatens such overwhelming disaster to all those in interest that it can not escape our attention. An average depreciation of 15 cents per gallon on the combined product of fine whiskies for the four years prior to 1894 would be a loss so great that no trade could stand it.

The only way to prevent this gross injustice to the citizen is to enact this bill into law. If it is not done, the only remaining refuge lies in the exportation of the spirits to avoid payment of the tax—a result which, while only partially relieving the distress of the citizen, in no way benefits the United States, nor saves to it any of the taxes exportation is necessarily made to avoid.

The unwisdom and injustice of driving the citizen to this mode of relief from bad laws will be further noticed in this report.

It was, indeed, considered by several of the committee that the proper and logical legislation for the emergency, and indeed for all time, was to provide for an indefinite and unlimited bonded period, with allowances for all evaporations naturally occurring without the fraud or negligence of the owner during the whole time the spirits remained in bond, requiring the tax to be paid only upon such of the spirits as went into consumption, thus taxing consumption instead of manufacture.

Our earliest internal revenue enactment (act of 1862) provided for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits only when they were sold for consumption. That is the law now as to all other subjects of internal-revenue taxation, such as tobacco, cigars, beer, etc.

Justice would seem to demand that no tax should be levied on what can never be sold for consumption. If every gallon of spirits on which the tax is paid is sold, and the purchase price paid by a consumer, the distiller or dealer has no cause of complaint, for in that case an equitable distribution of burdens arranges itself by the laws of trade; but if the tax is exacted on what has previously evaporated and gone into the air, the owner is out just that much without the possibility of recovery, and equally without the possibility of ever getting a price for it. Other countries do not tax what is never sold. The English distillers and the French distillers put their spirits into docks or warehouses, and they remain there indefinitely untaxed until they are sold, and then taxed only on what remains. The injustice of taxing evaporation has long been recognized by those of our laws which partially mitigated it.

Indeed, if the rule were once established that the tax should be paid only on what goes into consumption, all the uncertainty and injustice now complained of, and which tends periodically to prostrate the trade, would be removed and the legitimate consumption of spirits per annum would still measure the amount of revenue collected. It is error to suppose that anything but consumption ordinarily measures the amount of revenue obtained from distilled spirits. If there are materially more spirits in warehouses than the demands for consumption will justify paying taxes on, it will not be done. On the contrary, the spirits will and necessarily must be exported, for no man can afford to pay $1.10 per gallon tax on spirits and lay them aside to wait for a purchaser not reasonably expected soon to appear. He will either export the spirits or importune Congress for temporary relief. Recurring periods of such importunities, and the troubles that provoked them, have been the causes of many incongruities and difficulties in our system which do not exist in those of other countries.

Pending the committee's consideration of the subject, the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, has expressed himself to the committee upon one of the bills before them in this language:

"With reference to the indefinite extension of the bonded period, intended to be secured by the form of bond prescribed, I would state that these provisions of the bill meet with my full approval. In my opinion the same rule of taxation that applies to all other products subject to internal-revenue tax should apply to distilled spirits; that is to say, the tax should be levied only upon the article withdrawn from the premises of the manufacturer for consumption or sale. The sooner such a law is passed the sooner will Congress be relieved from solicitations to pass bills offered from time to time to afford temporary relief."

"It needs no argument to show that any legislation which interferes with the operation of the natural law of supply and demand will prove irksome, not to say destructive, to any business so interfered with. The internal-revenue laws which require that distilled spirits shall be thrown upon the domestic market at a certain time, without regard to the demand which may or may not exist at that time, and without regard to the quantity actually delivered at that time, introduce such elements into the business problem as must often render it one of difficult solution."

Some of the committee have not coincided with these general views, but all agree that there is an urgent necessity for the relief finally agreed upon in the bill now reported as being a wise adjustment of those differences of opinion and as being well adapted to existing conditions.

In order to accomplish this result the first section of the bill reduces the bonded period from eight years to seven years, and the second section increases the outage period from four years to seven years, thus making the two periods coextensive; and it will not be overlooked that the provisions of section 2 of the bill carefully guard the interests of the United States against any fraud or neglect upon the part of the distiller by giving the Commissioner of Internal Revenue ample authority to collect the tax at once in such cases.

No relief would have been adequate, or would have met the requirements of the evil conditions existing, which did not provide for so extending the outage period as to reach the enormous production of 1893—a production which the tables already given show was the largest ever known.

It was proposed by some to lower the bonded period to six years, and extend the outage period accordingly; but besides the difficulty already mentioned regarding the enormous production of 1893 this proposition would have required spirits made in the fiscal year 1898-99 to be tax paid at the same time as those which had been made in 1896-97, and those made in 1890-1900 to be tax paid at the same time as those produced in 1897-98, thus requiring in each of the years 1904 and 1905 the payment of taxes on two years' product instead of one. It was regarded as most unwise to do this. But it is probable that the hardship of bringing the two years of 1898 and 1899 together in 1906, which might be great, will be mitigated by the parties in interest exercising wisdom in adjusting their production next year to this condition.

Fine whiskies (bourbons and ryes) can not be made without long storage and aging in wood. This aging is a necessary part of their manufacture, without which the spirits are not fit for use, and necessarily involves a considerable evaporation each year. Experience has shown that the natural rate is practically what is provided for in section 2 of the bill. If it is more in any case no allowance is made for it. If it is less in any case the tax is, of course, collected on all that remains. The allowances named in the bill are simply the maximum quantities, and do not exempt from taxation any spirits which are actually on hand at the time of withdrawal from warehouse.

It is true that many fraudulent counterfeits are put upon the market with liberal quantities of foreign ingredients put into them which pay no tax, and in that way the people drink much which they are not aware of, and to that extent the Government fails to get the full revenue it would get without the addition of this foreign matter; but this only adds to the burden of the manufacturer who adheres to the undiluted article.

The aging of spirits is a very long and expensive process. The actual cash outlays for grain, labor, interest, insurance, etc., to say nothing of large plants, are very great, and profitable returns must be long waited for. When at last the long-drawn-out period of aging has culminated, the manufacturer may meet a prostrate or sensitive market to add to his burden, as is the case at this time.

In this respect he is very different from the maker of such merchandise as comes from a resort to adulterants. He is also very different from the manufacturer of such useful articles as alcohol, whose product is at its best when it runs from the still, and who can by immediate sales turn over his capital several times in one year, instead of waiting a good many years to turn it over once.

It has been shown as one reason for the passage of this bill that there are greatly more spirits in the warehouses than there is any demand for in the markets, and that all of them which are over four years old are rapidly depreciating in value, though getting better in quality, because the outage period does not now extend to them. But there is also another reason of great potency.

The Constitution of the United States, in clause 8, section 9, Article I, provides that "No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

This constitutional provision entitles every manufacturer at any time before the eight-year bonded period has expired, and before the tax is due, to export his product free of tax to some foreign country. He is driven, whether he wants to do so or not, to resort to this means of relief from the taxation if he can not find a purchaser. If he does not export it, our laws compel him to pay the tax of $1.10 per gallon on all that has been evaporated after four years as well as on what is left. As he finds it impossible to pay the tax, he must export. If he chooses to do so, any number of years afterwards he may reimpose the spirits, and when he does he only pays the tax on what is left and brought back.

In this way he gets the benefit of an unlimited outage period, he pays on nothing which has evaporated, and by a laborious and roundabout but indispensable method he has obtained what this bill proposes to give him directly. In doing it he has paid largely to foreign laborers, foreign insurance and warehouse companies, and foreign ships sums that should have been expended at home. Yet he has saved money by it, as the following illustrative example, prepared by one well acquainted with the facts, will show:

The United States is not injured, but benefited, by aiding in keeping in healthy condition the trade from which it derives so much revenue, and it is not believed by the committee that there will be any loss of revenue from the passage of the proposed bill, but a considerable gain. The facts shown, combined with the right to export, will always limit the revenues to what is sold to go into consumption, and while the Government would not encourage consumption for the sake of revenue, it should not so hamper the operations of the laws of trade as to diminish it. A healthy trade will make a healthy, reliable revenue.

The first three sections of the bill relate to the matters already discussed. The remaining sections are very strongly urged from the administrative standpoint by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury.

In the communication of the Secretary before referred to he uses the following language:

"Second. The effect of the greatly increased incentive to fraud furnished by the present high rate of tax is shown by the following facts:

"Since the passage of the act of August 23, 1894, the number of illicit distilleries and of registered distilleries reported as operated illicitly has increased from 1,016 to 1,905. The number of arrests for violation of the internal revenue laws has increased from 614 to 839.

"The number of registered grain distilleries in the United States averages annually about 1,000. Of this number one-half is the average number operated during each year. Of the 1,000 a little less than half have registered daily capacity of 4 bushels or less, 470 have a registered capacity of more than 4 but less than 20 bushels, and 469 have a capacity of 20 bushels or more. The records in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue show that since the increase of the tax a very large per cent of the smaller distilleries operate each year, and that the per cent of the larger distilleries operating during the year has decreased very considerably. In many sections of the country where these small distilleries are located it is found impracticable to sell forfeited spirits at a price equal to the amount of tax due on them. In these same sections it is found that distillers and dealers have agreed to furnish customers with distilled spirits at much less than the tax thereon, provided the purchasers agree to return the stamps intact or the barrel heads bearing the stamps. Other evidence is in the possession of the office of the Commissioner that in the sections where the small distilleries are operated spirits have been offered for sale at from 40 to 60 cents a gallon."

And the Commissioner in urging these provisions has furnished the committee with the following:

"Suggestions in support of the proposed measure requiring internal-revenue stamps to be affixed to certain packages containing distilled spirits not now required by law to be so stamped.

"Under the provisions of section 3295, Revised Statutes, as amended, all packages containing distilled spirits must have affixed thereto, before removal from the distiller's premises, stamps denoting payment of the tax thereon. The provisions of this section, while furnishing a basis of the entire stamp system as to distilled spirits subject to tax, do not in themselves afford adequate protection against evasion of the tax—as, for instance, where spirits are illegally produced, or, after being duly assessed for by the distiller, are surreptitiously removed from his distillery premises.

"With the view of preventing frauds of this character, the law (sections 3300 and 3321, Rev. Stat., as amended) also requires packages containing spirits rectified or rechecked on the premises of a rectifier or wholesale liquor dealer to have affixed thereto appropriate stamps after the spirits have been duly inspected and verified by an officer. These last-named provisions, however, apply only to casks or packages containing 5 wine gallons or more.

"So far as it extends, this system of stamping and re-stamping distilled spirits affords reasonable protection to the Government against fraud, but by taking advantage of the limitation above referred to dishonest distillers are enabled to dispose of their illicit spirits in kegs, jugs, and other vessels containing less than 5 wine gallons, and with comparatively little risk of detection.

"It is believed that the greater portion of the spirits illicitly produced in the United States are disposed of in the manner here described; and that the proposed measure, requiring the inspection and stamping of all packages containing not less than 1 wine gallon, not now required to be inspected and stamped, would not only tend to discourage illicit distilling, but would render it exceedingly difficult for dishonest distillers or dealers to dispose of any considerable quantity of spirits fraudulently removed from the distillery premises after having been duly deposited in a bonded warehouse. That frauds of the kind last referred to have been successfully committed, and with no small loss to the revenue, are clearly indicated by the large number of distillery warehouses which have of late years been destroyed by fire, and without any explainable reason other than for the purpose of concealing fraudulent removals of the spirits.

"The adoption of this proposed measure is therefore urged, not only as a needed protection to the revenue, but as an act of justice to the honest distiller, who is now forced to place his spirits, upon which a high rate of tax has been paid, in competition with spirits which the dishonest distiller is enabled, through a defect in the revenue law, to place on the market without payment of any tax whatever."

The last section of the bill is also insisted upon with great force by the Internal Revenue Office as being essential to the prevention of many frauds, and particularly that one which consists in shutting down a distillery if the revenue officer assigned to duty thereat does not happen to be agreeable to the distiller after he has traveled at his own expense to get there and must do the like to get back home.

* Reimported whiskies are usually sold as delivered in customs warehouse at above ports.

Threats to resort to this course have been known to aid in frauds or else have worked great injustice to the officer. This section is designed to prevent both the one and the other result.

The general subject of this bill received great attention from the Committee on Ways and Means at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress. Their report was written by the chairman, Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, and the following extracts from it will show how well the views of that committee agreed with those of the present committee.

It was there, among many other things, said:

"1. An indefinite extension of the time during which distilled spirits may remain in bond. Under the existing internal-revenue laws distilled spirits is the only article upon which the Government requires the tax to be paid before it is actually sold or removed for sale or consumption. In every other case the manufacturer keeps the article in his own possession and under his own exclusive control, without the payment of any tax, until he chooses to sell it or remove it for consumption or sale. The manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, cigars, beer, matches, perfumery, cosmetics, etc., are permitted to hold their goods until there is a consumptive demand for them, and pay the tax only when they sell.

"As we shall see hereafter, none of them are required to execute any bonds except as manufacturers, and the Government does not have the custody or control of their products as it does in the case of distilled spirits. In all these cases the tax is strictly upon consumption, and the manufacturer or owner is permitted to take advantage of favorable markets and avoid unfavorable ones to the same extent precisely as if there were no tax upon his goods. This is undoubtedly the true principle of excise taxation. While the Government is justifiable in exacting its revenue, it is not justifiable in attempting to control the trade in a legitimate article of commerce by forcing the owner either to sell at a loss on the original cost of production or to permanently invest the amount of the tax in addition to that cost.

"In his annual report for the year 1879, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, speaking of deficiency taxes upon spirits withdrawn for exportation, used the following language:

"The intention of the internal-revenue laws is to levy a tax of 90 cents a gallon upon spirits which are manufactured for and actually go into consumption in this country, and the tax in question is evidently not intended for revenue, but as a restrictive measure to prevent fraud."

"There appears to be no sufficient reason why the single article of distilled spirits should be excepted from the general rule applied to all other taxable products. It can not be for the mere purpose of preventing fraud on the revenue, for certainly there is not as much danger of a fraudulent removal of the property without the payment of the tax in a case where the Government itself has actual possession and control of it as in the cases where it is left in the custody of the manufacturer or owner under a bond that he will pay the tax when he sells or removes it. And so far as the cost of governmental supervision is involved, it is exactly the same whether the spirits remain in the warehouse for one year or for an indefinite time. The compensation of the storekeeper is the same in amount in each case, and his constant attendance at the warehouse is required in both.

"During the last fiscal year the consumption of distilled spirits in this country amounted to 67,372,575 gallons, the tax upon which was $62,214,127.50. About 12,000,000 gallons of these spirits consisted of what is known as bourbon and rye whiskies. On the last day of March last there was remaining in bond about 84,000,000 gallons of spirits, upon which the tax would amount to about $75,600,000. Much the greater part of this is bourbon and rye whisky. This vast accumulation of spirits in bond shows conclusively that the demand has not equalled the supply heretofore, and does not equal it now; and yet, under the existing law, the article is being forced out of the warehouse, and the owners are being compelled to advance the tax upon it before it can be sold.

"In considering the question as to the propriety of extending the bonded period, it must be borne in mind that the Government can gain nothing whatever by forcing the owners to pay the tax before there is a demand for the article, for the obvious reason that the spirits thus forced out will constitute a stock in the market which must be consumed before another supply will be manufactured. If the Government were to compel the payment of the tax in every case immediately upon the production of the spirits, it would not in a series of years collect a dollar more than if it permitted the article to remain in the warehouse for an indefinite length of time.

"In the first case, no more would be manufactured within a year than could be sold and consumed; while, in the second, every gallon that could be sold or consumed would certainly be withdrawn from the warehouse during every year. In the end the result would be precisely the same, no matter which course is pursued by the Government. In the absence of fraudulent evasions of the tax, an actual diminution of the consumptive demand is the only thing that can possibly reduce the revenue. If all the spirits now in bond were to be immediately destroyed by fire or other casualty, the total amount of revenue would not be affected in the least, because its place would be at once supplied by a new product, and consumption would go on at the usual rate.

"Suppose that the owners of the spirits now in bond shall be forced to pay 90 cents on the gallon and remove them from the warehouse before there is an actual demand for them in the market, they will, of course, be compelled to sell them at such prices as they can obtain. They can not afford to hold, for any considerable time, an article in which they have been compelled to invest so much beyond its intrinsic value, and the consequence will be that they will, necessarily, put prices down to the lowest possible point, and sell in competition with the inferior grades of goods known as rectified and compounded spirits. To the extent that they compete with these other grades of spirits they necessarily prevent their consumption, and thus deprive the Government of the tax which those spirits would otherwise have yielded. It is manifest that the Treasury can gain nothing by a policy which forces the consumption of one kind of spirits instead of another, so long as both kinds pay the same rate of tax, and it is equally manifest that the manufacturers and dealers in rectified and compounded spirits would be greatly injured by such a policy.

"The Government has possession of the spirits all the time, for, although the warehouse is erected by the distiller at his own expense, and is frequently a very costly building, the official storekeeper is required to keep it securely locked, and it is never allowed to be unlocked or opened except in his presence or in the presence of some person designated to act for him, and no articles are allowed to be received into it or delivered from it without an order or permit signed by the collector of the district. To secure the payment of the tax, therefore, the Government has, from the very beginning, the possession of all the property upon which the tax is imposed, and in case of default, by a failure to execute the bond or otherwise, nothing is necessary except to issue the proper process.

"4. The bill proposes to extend the maximum allowance for leakage and evaporation until the end of eight years, instead of three years, as now provided by the act of May 28, 1880. The law prescribing a maximum allowance for loss of spirits by leakage and evaporation has been in force nearly two years, and its operation has been, so far as the committee has been able to ascertain, satisfactory alike to the taxpayers and the revenue authorities. From July 20, 1886, to May 28, 1880, the owners of distilled spirits were required by law to pay a tax on the whole quantity entered in the warehouse, although a large part of it may have been actually lost by leakage and evaporation while in the custody of the Government officials.

"The seventeenth section of the act last mentioned required the spirits to be regauged when withdrawn, and established a scale of maximum allowances. In its report upon that bill this committee used the following language:

"A brief review of the former legislation upon this subject will show that the principle upon which the eighteenth section of the present bill is based is not a new one in this country, except in so far as it limits the measure of allowance for evaporation and leakage, and a reference to the existing internal-revenue laws imposing taxes upon manufactured articles other than distilled spirits will show that the same just and equitable rule is still applied to all of them.

"The forty-first section of the act of July 1, 1862, provided that there should be paid on all spirits that might be distilled and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, of first proof, on and after the 1st day of August, 1862, a tax of 20 cents on each gallon, and that it should be paid by the owner, agent, or superintendent at the still or other vessel in which such spirits might be distilled at the time of rendering the accounts of spirituous liquors as required by the act (12 Stats., page 447). The forty-fifth section of the same act required these accounts of the distiller to be rendered on the 1st, 10th, and 20th days of each month (12 Stats., page 448). Under this section and others contained in that law no duty was exacted on spirits in warehouse until there was a sale or removal for sale or consumption, and then only upon the number of gallons actually sold or removed.

"The twelfth section of the amendatory act of March 3, 1863, expressly authorized the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make rules and regulations providing for deductions, on account of leakage, from the quantity of spirituous liquors subject to taxation under the act to which it was an amendment, not exceeding 5 per cent of the amount removed for sale; and it was provided that the deduction should be so adjusted in different parts of the United States as to be proportioned as nearly as practicable to the distances over which the manufacturer usually transferred such liquors for the wholesale thereof (12 Stats., page 723). This, it will be observed, extended the principle a step further than the former law, and allowed for loss by leakage up to the time when the spirits had actually reached a market. Then followed the act of March 3, 1864, which returned to the principle of the act of 1862 and provided for a tax of 60 cents per gallon on all spirits that might be distilled and sold, or distilled and removed for consumption or sale, prior to the 1st day of next July, and under this law the tax was imposed only on the spirits inspected out of the bonded warehouse when removed for sale or consumption.

"The act of June 30, 1864, increased the tax to $1.50 per gallon, but made no change in the law as to allowances for evaporation and leakage; nor did the act of July 13, 1866, make any alteration of the law in this respect.

"Under these laws the tax was collected only on the quantity of spirits withdrawn from the warehouse, as is shown by the official circulars and instructions issued from the office of the Commissioner. In a circular dated February 1, 1866, relating to bonded-warehouse accounts, the collectors were directed to take credit "for leakage and loss of spirits in transport, and which stand in the warehouse;" and in the same document it was provided that "all actual loss of spirits or coal oil from leakage while in bonded warehouse will be allowed upon the proper certificate of the inspector;" and again, in the regulations of August 29, 1867, collectors were authorized to allow for leakage when it did not "exceed 1 per cent per month for each month the merchandise has been in store." Any loss in excess of that amount was to be allowed by the Commissioner himself instead of the collector.

"This was the state of the law and the practice under it until July 20, 1886, when Congress passed an act the fourth section of which declared that distilled spirits, spirits, alcohol, and alcoholic spirits, within the true intent and meaning of this act, is that substance known as ethyl alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl, or spirit of wine, which is commonly produced by the fermentation of grain, starch, molasses, or sugar, including all dilutions and mixtures of this substance, and that the tax should attach to this substance as soon as it is in existence as such, whether it be subsequently separated as pure or impure spirit, or be immediately or at some subsequent time transferred into any other substance, either in the process of original production or by any subsequent process (15 Stats., page 126).

"The latter part of the section just mentioned, declaring that the tax "shall attach to this substance as soon as it is in existence as such," established for the first time in our legislation upon this subject a rule which makes a great discrimination against distilled spirits as to the manner of assessing internal-revenue taxes, and subjects the manufacturers of that article to the evil of which they now complain. According to the letter of this law, the tax attaches to the alcohol as it exists in the mash while in the fermenting tubs and before it has been separated from the other substances by the process of distillation; and in accordance with this interpretation the distiller is now in many instances actually required to pay tax upon the spirits which ought to have been produced from the mash, although the entire fermented matter may have been lost or destroyed by accident, and without fraud or negligence upon his part. This injustice is accomplished by assessing him as for a deficiency in not having produced 80 per cent of the surveyed capacity of his distillery as established by law.

"As already intimated, this rule, which makes the tax attach to the article as soon as it has an existence, and without reference to its sale or consumption or removal for sale or consumption, is exceptional in our legislation, and applies only to distilled spirits. In the case of tobacco and snuff, articles upon which many millions of dollars are annually collected, the law provides for the collection of a tax only upon the quantities "manufactured and sold or removed for consumption and sale," and the manufacturer is permitted to retain them in his own possession, without the payment of tax, for as long a time as his interests or fancy may dictate. The law is the same with regard to fermented liquors, cigars, medicines or preparations, perfumery, cosmetics, matches, wax tapers, playing cards, etc. "Manufactured and sold," or "made and sold, or removed for consumption or sale," is the language of the law in all cases except distilled spirits; so that, with this single exception, the uniform and settled policy of the Government is to levy and collect internal-revenue taxes only upon manufactured articles which actually enter into consumption in this country, or are removed for consumption or sale in this country.

"During the present session, Congress, by the almost unanimous vote of both Houses, has reaffirmed this just policy by the passage of a bill allowing for loss by leakage while spirits are being transported to the port of shipment for exportation. The question of taxation upon exports could not affect the principle of that bill in the least, for the obvious reason that spirits actually lost by leakage or otherwise, and for which the allowance is to be made, can not be exported. It can only be vindicated upon the general ground that the citizen ought not to be compelled to pay an excise tax upon an article which can neither be sold nor consumed. This is undoubtedly the true policy, and is in strict accordance with the principles which underlie every just system of taxation; for upon no other theory or plan can the public burdens be properly distributed among those who ought rightfully to bear them.

"To tax the citizen upon a particular manufactured article simply because he has manufactured it, when, without fault or negligence of his, he can neither sell nor consume it, is to compel him to contribute more than his just proportion toward the support of the Government. When, however, the tax is collected upon the article sold or consumed, everyone who purchases or in any way uses it necessarily pays his share of the duty.

"But the existing system, erroneous as it is in principle, has not even the merit of being uniform in its operation upon all classes of distillers. Notwithstanding the positive declaration of the act of July 20, 1886, that the tax shall attach to the spirits or alcohol as soon as it exists, there is another section of the law which, by construction, exempts a large class of distillers from the payment of a tax upon the whole product of the grain used in their establishments and secures to them in every case an absolute allowance of from 3 to 5 per cent upon the entire quantity of spirits manufactured.

"These distillers complete the manufacture of their spirits and prepare it for the market by the process of continuous distillation; that is, they not only distill, but also rectify, purify, or refine the spirits. The ordinary distillers of high wines, rye, wheat, bourbon, and other grain-flavored spirits are required by the law, as already stated, to convey the product of the still directly to the receiving cistern, from which it is drawn off by the gauger, in the presence of the storekeeper, into casks or packages, and immediately marked, branded, and gauged for taxation, without any allowance whatever for waste or absorption; but the continuous distiller is permitted to conduct the spirits produced by him from the still to a tub or cistern, and thence to the rectifying, purifying, or refining apparatus; and after it has been subjected to that additional process it is, for the first time, marked, branded, and gauged for taxation.

"From the time it leaves the still until it is gauged, after rectification and purification, there is a waste of from 3 to 5 per cent, or from 1½ to 2 gallons in each package of 40 gallons. This gives to the continuous distiller a great advantage over others who manufacture only high wines, rye, wheat, or Bourbon spirits, because, when the latter pay a tax upon 100 gallons as it comes from the still, he pays only upon 95, or, at the most, 97 gallons; and, besides, he has so refined and purified his article that it is ready to go on the market for immediate sale and consumption.

"The bill reported will place all distillers upon precisely the same footing in this respect by requiring all alike to pay the tax only upon the quantity sold or removed for consumption or sale, whether it be refined and prepared for the market by the mechanical process just mentioned or otherwise.

"It is a fact worthy of serious consideration in this connection, as tending to show the gross injustice resulting to domestic distillers, rectifiers, and dealers from the operation of the present law, that foreign traders may now purchase untaxed spirits in this country, or receive a drawback if the tax has been paid, with allowances for leakage between the warehouse and port of shipment, export it to a European or other port, keep it as many years as may be desirable to give it age and value, and then reimport it, have it gauged at the customs warehouse, and pay a tax of 60 cents per gallon upon the actual contents of each package.

"In this way the foreign dealer receives the benefit of the whole amount of evaporation and leakage, is exempt from the payment of interest upon the tax, and finally places the spirits, greatly increased in value by age, upon the American market in competition with the domestic distiller and dealer, who have been compelled to pay a tax upon the original quantity contained in the packages, and interest upon that tax besides. The whole cost of exporting the article to Liverpool and reimporting it into this country will not exceed the interest which the home producer or owner is compelled to pay on the tax, so that the foreign parties actually secure by the operation a clear advantage of from 7½ to 10 gallons on each package of 40 gallons.

"This proceeding is authorized by section 2500 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that upon the reimportation of articles once exported, of the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, upon which no internal revenue has been assessed or paid, or upon which such tax has been paid and refunded by allowance or drawback, there shall be levied, collected, and paid as duty equal to the tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws upon such articles. Under this statute and the decisions of the Treasury Department upon the subject, large quantities of domestic distilled spirits have already been sent from this country to Liverpool and to the Bermudas and other places, and, after remaining there in bond for a sufficient length of time to become purified and refined by age, have returned to our ports and paid the internal-revenue tax, with a full allowance for evaporation, leakage, and other loss.

"The bill lately passed by the House does not increase the maximum allowances in any case, but merely extends the period for which they may be made from three years to eight years, and provides that after that time no allowance or deduction shall be made. The spirits are to be regauged as provided by the existing law, and if it shall be found that there has been a loss, without the fault or negligence of the distiller or owner, the tax is to be collected only on the quantity of distilled spirits contained in the cask or package at the time of the withdrawal; but in no case can the allowance exceed the quantity named in the bill, even though there may have been in fact a loss of double that quantity. On the other hand, if it shall be ascertained by the regauge that less than the quantity mentioned in the bill has been lost, the allowance can be made only for the actual deficiency.

"Each package must be regauged and its contents accounted for separately, so that it is impossible, under any circumstances, for the owner or distiller to secure an allowance for more than is actually lost; while it may often happen, and, in fact, does often happen in the practical administration of the law, that he is compelled to pay the tax on spirits wholly lost by leakage and evaporation. For instance, if a number of packages have remained in the warehouses for two years and when regauged it is ascertained that one of them has lost 2 gallons, another 3 gallons, and another 10 gallons, making an actual loss of 15 in all, yet the distiller or owner will, under the bill, receive an allowance of only 10½ gallons; that is, he will be allowed only the actual loss on the first two packages, and the maximum quantity, 5½ gallons, allowed by the bill on the third one.

"It will be seen, therefore, that the question of average losses by leakage or evaporation does not enter into the consideration of this subject at all. There are no average allowances; the distiller or dealer who has 5,000 packages in the warehouse is, in this respect, in precisely the same situation as the distiller or dealer who has only 1 package. Each separate package will be allowed for its own loss of contents, unless it exceeds the quantity prescribed by the bill for the time it has been in the warehouse; and if it should exceed that quantity the owner must pay the tax on the excess without regard to the fact that some other package has lost less than the maximum allowance.

"In this connection it is proper to call attention to section 3393 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of March 3, 1879, under which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has the right, at any time when he believes that there has been an excessive loss of distilled spirits from any cask or package, to require the immediate withdrawal of such spirits from the warehouse and the payment of the tax upon the original quantity entered. So much of the section as relates to this subject is as follows:

"If it shall appear at any time that there has been a loss of distilled spirits from any cask or other package hereafter deposited in a distillery warehouse, other than the loss provided for in section 3221 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, is excessive, he may instruct the collector of the district in which the loss has occurred to require the withdrawal from warehouse of such spirits, and to collect the tax accrued upon the original quantity of distilled spirits entered into the warehouse in such cask or package, together with the interest accrued thereon, if any, notwithstanding that the time specified in any bond given for the withdrawal of the spirits entered into warehouse in such cask or package has not expired. If the said tax and interest are not paid on demand, the collector shall report the amount due upon his next monthly list, and it shall be assessed and collected as other taxes are assessed and collected."

And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at the time expressed his views on the subject as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 3, 1893.

SIR: I acknowledge receipt of your valued favor of this instant in regard to House bill No. 5297, which provides for an extension of the bonded period upon distilled spirits.

The bill was prepared with great care, and in respect to its machinery I am satisfied it will work admirably. The principle of the bill is, I think, correct. Upon all manufactured articles upon which the internal-revenue tax is levied, except in the case of distilled spirits, the manufacturer or owner is not compelled to remove the same from the place of manufacture until he can find a sale for the product. This is so in respect to beer, tobacco, cigars, matches, etc.

The extension of the bonded period to three years gave quite a stimulus to the manufacture of fine whiskies. On the 1st of March last there were 69,243,833 gallons in distillery warehouses in Kentucky, Pennsylvania, and Maryland. It seems to me unreasonable to suppose that these spirits can all be removed for consumption within the time now required by law. If the manufacturers and owners are required to pay the taxes within three years, I would expect to see such a decline in prices as would seriously embarrass many strong firms, probably cause many failures, and unfavorably affect other branches of business without any beneficial results to the Government. I think, upon this ground alone, the extension of the bonded period is entirely justifiable.

Very respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM,
Commissioner.

HON. BEN. BUTTERWORTH,
House of Representatives.

Mr. BRUCKER. As I understand it, these bonded warehouses are owned by distillers.

Mr. EVANS. Unquestionably.

Mr. BRUCKER. And during the period to which the gentleman refers the expense of insurance and care and maintenance of the property is borne by the individual.

Mr. EVANS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BRUCKER. Supervision and everything.

Mr. EVANS. Certainly. Everything except the payment of the storekeeper in charge. He is paid by the Government. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not undertake to consume any more time.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EVANS. Certainly; and I shall be glad to answer any other question.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. What effect will this have on whisky that is now in bond?

Mr. EVANS. This will have no effect upon whisky now in bond except to give the outages allowed by this bill to it.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. That is what I supposed.

Mr. EVANS. That is all.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. That is the basis of this bill, is it not?

Mr. EVANS. That is the basis of one section of the bill.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. I supposed that was the purpose of it. The Government loses the revenue, does it not?

Mr. EVANS. The Government does not lose one dollar of revenue. On the contrary, I say the passage of this bill will ultimately greatly increase the revenues of the Government, and I say, after having considered it perhaps quite as much as the gentleman, that the ultimate effect of this bill will be largely to increase the revenues of the Government. The reasons for this view are clearly stated in the report of the committee.

The falling off in production of warehoused spirits (bourbons and ryes) from 56,000,000 gallons in 1893 to less than ten and one-half million gallons in 1897 shows how the Government has lost, while a healthy condition of the trade would certainly increase the revenues. When I say warehoused spirits, I mean those put in bond on which the tax will be paid. I do not allude to the enormous increase in illicit production on which the tax is not collected.

Mr. SIMS. I should like to ask the gentleman the question which I asked the gentleman from Ohio, but which he did not answer.

Mr. EVANS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. From the arguments I hear made here, that the farmer is interested in this, and that the cooper is interested in it, on the idea that there will be more grain distilled and more barrels made, therefore from that argument is it not the purpose to manufacture and consume more whisky in the interest of the distillers?

Mr. EVANS. I have not myself made an argument on the bill from the standpoint of the farmer or anybody else, except the Government of the United States and the distillers, whose interests, I think, will alike be largely promoted. I think the passage of the bill will prevent an overwhelming disaster to the distilling interests, which, if it came, would necessarily affect the interest of the Government, which gets so much out of them.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. EVANS. "The gentleman" did not make a suggestion that it would be beneficial to the farmer, because "the gentleman" has not considered it from that standpoint.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask the gentleman the direct question: Is it not the object of this bill to increase the manufacture and consumption of whisky in this country?

Mr. EVANS. It certainly is not.

Mr. SIMS. How does the present law bring disaster, then?

Mr. EVANS. If you will take the pains to read the report, I think you will see exactly how the present law will bring disaster. The present law extends the bonded period to eight years, but only extends the outage period to four years. Just as soon as the four-year period has expired, the value of the whisky in bond, that has remained four years, is reduced by 15 to 20 cents per gallon, as the evidence clearly showed the committee. The bill will ultimately increase the revenue, but will not in any way advantage the distiller except in the way that I have stated, as to outages.

Mr. BRUCKER. I will ask the gentleman this question: If the owners of the whisky are to be credited the outage or evaporation, how is the Government going to be the gainer in the long run?

Mr. EVANS. It is believed that if this provision is made, there will be a healthy trade and there will be a failure to export spirits.

Mr. BRUCKER. More spirits consumed?

Mr. EVANS. There will be a healthy trade.

Mr. YOST. And there will be less illicit distilling.

Mr. EVANS. There will certainly be less illicit distilling. That is one of the great evils of the present high tax; it greatly increases frauds. One section of the bill is designed to prevent the consumption of illicit spirits as against tax-paid spirits. High taxes greatly increase, as the report and the figures show, the illicit trade. We desire to give the Government the benefit of the tax on all whisky that is consumed, rather than give an advantage to the illicit distiller. The time for general debate having expired, I hope the bill may now be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendments under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3293 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as the same has from time to time been amended, be, and the same is, further amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 3293. The distiller or owner of all spirits removed as aforesaid to the distillery warehouse shall, on the 1st day of each month, or within five days thereafter, enter the same for deposit in such warehouse, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe. Said entry shall be in triplicate, and shall contain the name of the person making the entry, the designation of the warehouse in which the deposit is made, and the date thereof, and shall be in the following form:

"ENTRY FOR DEPOSIT IN DISTILLERY WAREHOUSE.

"Entry of distilled spirits deposited by ——— in distillery warehouse ——— in the ——— district, State of ———, during the month ending on the ——— day of ———, A. D. ———."

"And the entry shall specify the kind of spirits, the whole number of packages, the marks and serial numbers thereon, the number of gauge or wine gallons, proof gallons, and taxable gallons contained in them, all of which shall be verified by the oath of the distiller or owner of the same attached to the entry.

"The distiller or owner shall at the time of making said entry give his bond in duplicate, with one or more sureties satisfactory to the collector of the district, and in a penal sum not less than the tax on the spirits covered thereby, and conditioned that the principal therein named shall well and faithfully comply with all the requirements of law and regulations respecting the depositing, storing, and rebonding of such spirits, and will pay all taxes due on the spirits before or at the time of their removal from such warehouse, and within seven years from the date of said entry, and will likewise pay on demand the tax on any such spirits which may be lost by leakage or from any cause whatsoever while stored in such warehouse and not allowed by law. One of said entries shall be retained in the office of the collector of the district, one sent to the storekeeper in charge of the warehouse, to be retained and filed in the warehouse, and one sent with the duplicate of the bond to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be filed in his office: Provided, That the distiller may, at his option and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, execute an annual bond for the spirits so deposited in lieu of the bond herein provided.

Mr. McRAE. I move to strike out, in line 23, page 2, the word "seven" and insert the word "four."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 23, strike out the word "seven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four;" so as to read: "four years."

Mr. McRAE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that it seems to me we can remove the only just criticism which to my mind there is anything in by changing this to four years. This makes the outage period and the bonded period the same as is proposed by the bill, except that it changes it from seven years to four years, and the Government will then lose no money at all in waiting for anything that is now due. It will collect it when due under the present law. And if it were the only purpose of this bill, this amendment would be adopted.

But if it is to give three years longer in which the money can be kept by the whisky trust, then the bill will pass as reported. Make this change, and alter the other provisions of the bill so that they will conform to it, and you will have left the bill as I believe it ought to be. So far as I am concerned, speaking for myself, I believe that this manufactured whisky ought to pay the tax required by law and, above everything else, it ought to pay it at this time and within the time fixed; and if they do not pay it, then they ought to bear the loss by evaporation as the law contemplated when this bonded period was extended from three to eight years.

Mr. BRUCKER. Does your amendment give the distillers any credit for the evaporation at the end of the four-year period?

Mr. McRAE. It gives them the evaporation during the four-year period. They get the benefit of that evaporation for four years, but not for seven. Now, the whole purpose of this bill is to give them a rate of deduction of 2 gallons, I think it is, each year for each barrel, which is about $6.60 for the three years the whisky is in bond after the four-year period. The tax is now due, and I do not believe the country is in any condition to make any such concession to this industry.

It is an industry that ought to be heavily taxed, and I do not believe that if this release was refused that they would suffer any more than other branches of business. We can not afford to say that we will only tax the branches of business that are prosperous in the face of the bill recently passed by this House. The tax on whisky does yield an immense revenue, and it ought to yield it. I will not take up the time of the House in telling why it ought to contribute to defray the expenses of the Government. It is the policy of the Government to tax whisky. The reasons for it are known of all men. It is enough to say that we ought not, when we are bonding generations yet to come, and taxing everything owned by the poor, to release to the distillers of the country $6.60 on a barrel of whisky.

Mr. BRUCKER. The effect of the bill, if passed in its present form, would be retroactive, would it not?

Mr. McRAE. Yes; in a sense.

Mr. BRUCKER. It would relieve the distillers of the tax now due the Government how much a barrel?

Mr. McRAE. If it is 2 gallons a barrel per year, and the tax is $1.10, and the period is three years, that would be $6.60.

Mr. SWANSON. This bill does not extend the time of the payment; it reduces it.

Mr. McRAE. We understand exactly that the period has been reduced from eight to seven years, but there is no evaporation allowed after four years under the present law, and unless they pay it in four years they suffer the loss, which is enough to make them pay. It has already been shown by the gentleman from Ohio that it is to their interest to pay it; that they put inferior whisky upon us because they will not suffer the loss of the evaporation. I say it is the duty of the Government to get the revenue, and if, as a consequence of getting the revenue, it reduces the consumption of whisky, you have, in my opinion, accomplished two good purposes.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the gentleman to say that although the distillers have eight years to keep their whisky in bond, yet, as they sustain the loss, they will pay the tax and the Government will get it immediately.

Mr. McRAE. Yes; I hope so.

Mr. SWANSON. What position does that put the distillers of America in? This Government prevents the American distiller from having an opportunity to let his whisky get good and mellow and old, so as to compete with the foreign distillers of whisky. Consequently, you have a vast importation of foreign whisky, because we do not give the American distiller an opportunity to get his whisky old and mellow as the law gives the foreign distiller. I say that the American should have the same opportunity allowed him as is allowed foreign distillers.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to answer a remark of the gentleman from Arkansas. I suppose the gentleman from Arkansas knows that under the present law if whisky is destroyed by fire, or by any unavoidable accident not due to the negligence of the owner or distiller of the whisky, he is relieved from the payment of the tax on that whisky. Now, what difference is there in principle between that slow loss which occurs by evaporation, or the soaking of the whisky into the barrel, and that great, rapid loss which occurs by the evaporation and destruction of the whisky in the case of loss by fire?

The distiller is not required to pay a tax on whisky burned up or that which occurs by leakage for the first four years. The principle is admitted by the Government by the allowance of the outage during the first four years. The Government recognizes this loss, and says it is unfair that the distiller should pay a tax on a vacuum, on a thing that does not exist. Why is not the fairness of this bill exactly the same as that which the Government now recognizes is just? On the whisky that is in four years the outage is now allowed to the owner. This bill says at the end of five, six, or seven years, if he draws it out, he shall be allowed to pay tax only on what is in the barrel. Is not that fair? Is not that just?

Mr. McRAE. I think not. There is a vast difference between that which is destroyed by fire and that which evaporates. In the one case it is all lost; in the other that which remains is improved in quality by reason of the evaporation.

Mr. BROMWELL. Only a difference in the length of time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And in amount.

Mr. McRAE. It was supposed that four years was a sufficient time to age whisky and make it fit for use. In 1894, at the request of the whisky distillers, it was extended to eight years, for the reason alleged by them that it did not properly age in a shorter time.

Now, after having that period extended and their agreement to take the risk and bear the loss for that four years, they come and insist on a rebate for the additional years. I would like to ask my friend, who appears to be an expert in this matter of distilling whisky, how long before whisky will become perfected? It will not take very many more years to destroy half of it, and if you continue to allow for loss for twenty years at the rate mentioned in this bill, there will be nothing left to tax; you will not have any whisky in the barrel at all.

Mr. BROMWELL. Let me remind the gentleman that it was not the whisky men who made this compromise by which the bonded period was extended to eight years and the tax increased to $1.10. That arrangement was made in the Senate of the United States against their protest.

Mr. EVANS. And it was made in the Wilson bill, for which my friend from Arkansas voted.

Mr. McRAE. Well, I think the tax ought to have been increased.

Mr. BROMWELL. That provision was distinctly understood to be a thing to trade upon when the Wilson bill should come back to the House; but unfortunately the gentleman from Arkansas and the other gentlemen on his side of the House were so anxious to get the Wilson bill passed in some shape that there was no chance for the trade to be made so as to give the whisky people what they did want.

Mr. McRAE. So far as I am concerned, I have no regret that the tax was fixed at $1.10. I would not vote to reduce it to-day. If we could get more money out of it, I would vote to increase it. What I object to is that you extend the time for the payment of the tax which is due from these distillers, while upon other men—men who are half clad and without sufficient food—you lay the heavy hand of the law and compel them to contribute to the expenses of this Government, without any special privilege in their favor. That is what I protest against.

Mr. EVANS. I call for a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE].

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 28, noes 53.

Mr. McRAE. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 10 voting therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are refused; the noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

A new bond shall be required in case of death, insolvency, or removal from the State of either of the sureties, and may be required in any other contingency affecting its validity or impairing its efficiency, at the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and in case the distiller or owner fails or refuses to give the bond hereinafter required, or to renew the same if lawfully required, or neglects, if lawfully required to do so, to immediately withdraw the spirits and pay the tax thereon, or, if he neglects to withdraw any bonded spirits and pay the tax thereon before the expiration of the time limited in the bond, the collector shall proceed to collect the tax by distraint, issuing his warrant of distraint for the tax found to be due, as ascertained by him from the report of the gauger if no bond is given, or from the terms of the bond if a bond was given; but this provision shall not exclude any other remedy or proceeding provided by law.

"If it shall appear at any time that there has been a loss of distilled spirits from any cask or other package deposited in any distillery warehouse, general bonded warehouse, or special bonded warehouse other than the loss provided for in this act and in section 3231 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended, which in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is excessive or fraudulent, he may instruct the collector of the district in which the loss has occurred to require the withdrawal from warehouse of such distilled spirits and to collect the taxes accrued upon the original quantity of distilled spirits entered in the warehouse in such cask or package, notwithstanding that the time specified in any bond given for the withdrawal of the spirits entered into warehouse in such cask or package has not expired. If the said tax is not paid on demand, the collector shall report the amount due on his next monthly list, and it shall be assessed and collected as other taxes are assessed and collected.

"That the tax on distilled spirits shall be paid by the distiller or owner before and at the time of the removal of the spirits from the distillery or other place of storage, and within seven years from the date of the entry for deposit therein, except in case the removal therefrom without payment of the tax is authorized by law; and all warehousing and transportation and warehousing bonds hereafter taken under any provision of the internal-revenue laws relating to distilled spirits shall be conditioned for the payment of the tax before removal from warehouse and within seven years as to fruit brandy from the date of the original gauge and as to all other spirits from the date of the original entry for deposit: Provided, That the tax on distilled spirits heretofore deposited in any distillery warehouse or general bonded warehouse or special bonded warehouse and lawfully remaining therein shall be due and payable within the time conditioned in the warehousing bond or transportation and warehousing bond given therefor: And provided further, That all bonds hereafter given for distilled spirits produced prior to the passage of this act and redeposited in any general bonded warehouse, or special bonded warehouse, shall be conditioned for the payment of the tax within the time as specified in the bonds given upon the original deposit of said spirits in warehouse."

Sec. 2. That section 50 of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," passed August 23, 1894, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 50. That the distiller or owner of any distilled spirits deposited in any distillery, warehouse, or special bonded warehouse or in any general bonded warehouse may, prior to the expiration of seven years from the date of original gauge, file with the collector a notice giving a description of the packages containing the spirits and request a regauge of the same; and thereupon the collector shall direct a gauger to regauge the spirits, and to mark upon each such package the number of gauge or wine gallons and proof gallons therein contained. If upon such regauging it shall appear that there has been a loss of distilled spirits from any cask or package, without the fault or negligence of the distiller or owner thereof, taxes shall be collected only on the quantity of distilled spirits contained in such cask or package at the time of the withdrawal thereof from the distillery warehouse or other bonded warehouse: Provided, however, That the allowance which shall be made for such loss of spirits as aforesaid shall not exceed 1 proof gallon for two months or part thereof; 1½ gallons for three and four months; 2 gallons for five and six months; 2½ gallons for seven and eight months; 3 gallons for nine and ten months; 3½ gallons for eleven and twelve months; 4 gallons for thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen months; 4½ gallons for sixteen, seventeen, and eighteen months; 5 gallons for nineteen, twenty, and twenty-one months; 5½ gallons for twenty-two, twenty-three, and twenty-four months; 6 gallons for twenty-five, twenty-six, and twenty-seven months; 6½ gallons for twenty-eight, twenty-nine, and thirty months; 7 gallons for thirty-one, thirty-two, and thirty-three months; 7½ gallons for thirty-four, thirty-five, and thirty-six months; 8 gallons for thirty-seven, thirty-eight, thirty-nine, and forty months; 8½ gallons for forty-one, forty-two, forty-three, and forty-four months; 9 gallons for forty-five, forty-six, forty-seven, and forty-eight months; 9½ gallons for forty-nine, fifty, fifty-one, and fifty-two months; 10 gallons for fifty-three, fifty-four, fifty-five, and fifty-six months; 10½ gallons for fifty-seven, fifty-eight, fifty-nine, and sixty months; 11 gallons for sixty-one, sixty-two, sixty-three, and sixty-four months; 11½ gallons for sixty-five, sixty-six, sixty-seven, and sixty-eight months; 12 gallons for sixty-nine, seventy, seventy-one, and seventy-two months; 12½ gallons for seventy-three, seventy-four, seventy-five, and seventy-six months; 13 gallons for seventy-seven, seventy-eight, seventy-nine, and eighty months; 13½ gallons for eighty-one, eighty-two, eighty-three, and eighty-four months; and no further allowance shall be made: And provided further, That in case such spirits shall remain in warehouse after the same have been regauged, the packages containing the spirits shall, at the time of withdrawal from warehouse, and at such other times as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may direct, be again regauged or inspected; and if found to contain a larger quantity than shown by the first regauge, the tax shall be collected and paid on the quantity contained in each such package as shown by the original gauge: Provided further, That taxes shall be collected on the quantity contained in each cask or package as shown by the original gauge, where the distiller does not request a regauge before the expiration of seven years from the date of the original entry or gauge; that the foregoing allowance of loss shall apply only to casks or packages of a capacity of 40 or more wine gallons, and that the allowance for loss on casks or packages of less capacity than 40 gallons shall not exceed one-half the amount allowed on said 40-gallon cask or package; but no allowance shall be made on casks or packages of less capacity than 20 gallons: And provided further, That the proof of such distilled spirits shall not in any case be computed at the time of withdrawal at less than 100 per cent.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to amend by inserting at the end of section 2 the proviso which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided also, That distilled spirits hereafter exported and subsequently imported shall pay an import duty equivalent to the internal tax that would have been imposed upon such spirits at the time of importation if such spirits had not been exported.

Mr. DINGLEY. The object of this amendment is to make entirely clear a provision of the tariff act of 1897 relating to goods exported and subsequently imported. Some question has arisen as to how that act should be construed with reference to spirits, and in some cases the construction has been adopted that the internal tax to be paid in the form of a duty should be the tax that any spirits would bear at the time of importation.

The object of this amendment is to have them bear the same import duty at the time of importation that they would have borne as an internal tax if they had remained in this country. In other words, we desire not to put a premium upon exportation and subsequent importation in the case of spirits. The amendment simply carries out the real intent of the present law. As there has been some misunderstanding in reference to the question, this amendment is offered for the purpose of making the matter perfectly clear.

Mr. McRAE. As I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Maine, it will deprive the American distiller of the benefit of the evaporation for the time that the spirits may remain in foreign countries.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. The amendment simply takes away the premium for exporting spirits, retaining them in a bonded warehouse abroad, and then importing them.

Mr. McRAE. What is that "premium," if not the saving of the tax on the importation?

Mr. DINGLEY. In the exportation of spirits and allowing them to remain abroad and subsequently importing them there is, it is claimed, a profit amounting to several dollars per barrel. This arises from a particular construction which has in some cases been adopted of the statutes relating to exported goods which are subsequently imported as applied to spirits. I may say it never was the intention of the statutes to grant any such premium.

Mr. McRAE. If I understand the gentleman's proposition, I am in favor of it, and think it ought to be adopted. But I wish to know what is the "premium" that the gentleman speaks of? Is it not the tax on the amount of whisky which it is claimed is lost by reason of the evaporation which occurs during the period the spirits remain in bond or in a foreign country? Can it mean anything else? If it is anything else, what is it?

Mr. DINGLEY. Under the law as it exists to-day the period allowed for evaporation expires at the end of four years. Now, in order to avoid the payment of the tax at the end of that time the practice has grown up, under the construction of the statute to which I have referred, of exporting spirits, to be placed in bond abroad for the purpose of further evaporation, then importing the spirits and paying internal tax according to the quantity of spirits that there may be in the barrel at the time of importation.

For the purpose of preventing any such evasion of the law, this amendment is offered, providing that when spirits are exported and subsequently imported they shall pay the same duty as an internal-revenue tax which they would have paid if they had remained in this country. This takes away the temptation to export spirits simply for the purpose of avoiding the taxation which would arise if they remained in this country.

Mr. McRAE. That is just the way I understood the proposition of the gentleman from Maine. Now that this matter is clearly understood, it seems to me the House can and ought to see its way clear to make the change in the other parts of this bill which I have suggested. When, by such a proposition as the gentleman from Maine now submits, you can make it impossible for the Government to be defrauded out of its internal tax, the House is confronted with the question which it can not dodge, whether it will give this relief to the distiller.

As implied in the amendment and the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, you can prevent the evasion of the internal tax by imposing such a tax as the gentleman from Maine proposes. Now, why should we not reduce the period during which whisky may continue in bond to four years? You will then get the tax from these distillers three years earlier than you will under this bill. I have called attention to this amendment in connection with what has been said, in order that the House and the country may understand this bill as I believe it is, a proposition to give to the large manufacturers of whisky in this country three years longer in which to pay their taxes, or rather to bear the loss of the evaporation for them if they do not pay during that time.

Mr. BRUCKER. Suppose the distillers at the end of four years export their whisky and sell it abroad and do not reimport it, does not the Government collect the tax?

Mr. McRAE. No; they do not collect anything on whisky or anything else exported. The Constitution prevents that; but the great object here is to get this internal tax. We can secure the collection of this tax by laying an adequate customs duty upon it when it is imported. That is easy, if we want to do it. The question is, Shall we consent to give an extension to them in which the tax shall be paid and deduct all loss of evaporation? That is all there is in this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Did the gentleman vote for the Wilson bill in 1894?

Mr. McRAE. Oh, I think so.

Mr. PAYNE. Did the gentleman know when he voted for the Wilson bill that it contained this privilege, extending the bonding period from four years to eight years?

Mr. McRAE. I think I did.

Mr. PAYNE. Did the gentleman know at that time that he was putting off the time of the payment of this tax four years?

Mr. McRAE. I knew also that the Government did not assume the loss of the evaporation during this extended period. I am not willing to give that to them now.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman know that that bill increased the outage period from three years to four years, so that it did give them a partial benefit?

Mr. McRAE. Yes; but I was willing to concede all those things in order to get an increased tax of 20 cents a gallon upon whisky. The gentleman voted against that proposition, voted against all of those propositions. He had better reconcile his own record instead of attacking mine. If he opposed that bill then, why does he favor this one now? He and I opposed each other then and we do now.

Mr. PAYNE. I shall not have any trouble about my own record upon that question. The gentleman insisted then upon voting to increase this bonded period, and now, by the gentleman's action, distilleries are loaded up with whisky from 4 to 8 years old. Now the gentleman comes in here and asks the House to vote to compel them to pay the taxes on those whiskies which are from 4 to 8 years old, of which there are millions upon millions of gallons, and to pay that tax, although he knows, or ought to know, that they can not find a market in the United States for 5 per cent of the whisky now.

He would compel them to pay $1.10 a gallon, which amounts to over eleven hundred per cent upon the value of the whisky. I am content with my vote against raising the tax on whisky 20 cents a gallon, because I believed there was more revenue to the United States Government in 90 cents a gallon than there would be at $1.10 a gallon—

Mr. McRAE. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. PAYNE. Very well.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I am proud of my vote to raise the tax upon whisky, because it was an honest effort on my part to get from that source more revenue for the Government; but if it had the effect of reducing the consumption of the stuff, I do not regret it for that reason. The people would be in better condition than they are if consumption were still further reduced.

Mr. Chairman, I will not give my vote to remit $6.60 a barrel to the whisky distillers of this country when an effort is now being made to lay a stamp tax upon the notes and mortgages of the poor and upon the medicines of the sick of this country. When we are driven to such necessities as that, you will never get my vote to relieve the whisky manufacturers from taxes because they can not find a market for their whisky. The people of my State pay taxes on property they can not sell.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. The taxes are already due on this whisky.

Mr. McRAE. Certainly, the tax is due. That is why the bill is pressed at this time.

Mr. EVANS. I call for a vote on the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. DINGLEY was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. EVANS. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McRAE) there were—ayes 68, noes 25.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10253) to amend the internal-revenue laws relating to distilled spirits, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to the passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill,

Mr. McRAE demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 27.

Mr. McRAE. Yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EVANS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I understand the yeas and nays are ordered. That will be the first vote in the morning.

The SPEAKER. The first vote in the morning.

SECOND ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. CARTER. By direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I report a bill and request its present consideration. I ask that the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War be read in connection with the bill.

The bill (S. 4673) providing for a Second Assistant Secretary of War was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be in the Department of War, during the existing war, a Second Assistant Secretary of War, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be entitled to a salary of $4,000 a year, payable monthly, and who shall perform such duties in the Department of War as shall be prescribed by the Secretary or may be required by law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the letter from the Secretary of War be read.

Mr. BATE. I am in favor of the bill; but a measure of this kind should certainly be considered with more than eight or ten Senators in their seats. Being a matter of such importance, I think it proper that we should have a quorum present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum is suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll.

After some little delay,

Mr. ALLISON. May I inquire if the Sergeant-at-Arms has taken proper steps to inform Senators that the Senate is in session? If not, I hope that direction will be given to him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that no direction has been given to the Sergeant-at-Arms except by the Chair.

The following Senators having answered to their names:

Allen,	Fairbanks,	McEnery,	Pritchard,

The VICE-PRESIDENT (at 11 o'clock and 17 minutes a. m.). Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CARTER. Let the letter of the Secretary of War be read in connection with the bill. It is very brief and explains the reasons why the bill should pass.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the bill take any time?

Mr. CARTER. It will not lead to any discussion, I think.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that the letter be printed in the Record without reading.

Mr. CARTER. Very well; let it be printed in the RECORD. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of War be read.

Mr. CARTER. I trust the Senator from Maine will not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. Let the Secretary read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 20, 1898.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your oral inquiry this morning, respecting the office of Assistant Secretary of War, I beg to say that upon examination it is found that the appointment of an Assistant Secretary of War was authorized by an act of August 3, 1861 (12 Stat., page 287), and that an act of January 22, 1862 (12 Stat., page 332), authorized the appointment of two additional Assistant Secretaries of War for the period of one year. An act of February 20, 1865, authorized the appointment of an additional Assistant Secretary of War for one year (13 Stat., page 331). By section 4 of the "Act to provide for the temporary increase of the pay of officers in the Army, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, section 1 of the act of August 3, 1861, authorizing the President to appoint an Assistant Secretary of War, was repealed. The office was, however, revived by act of August 5, 1862, but, not having been filled, the provision of the said act reviving the office was repealed. By act of March 5, 1890 (26 Stat., page 17), the appointment of an Assistant Secretary of War was again authorized.

The records show that P. H. Watson, of the District of Columbia, was appointed Assistant Secretary of War on January 22, 1862, and continued in that office until July 31, 1864; that John Tucker, of Pennsylvania, was appointed Assistant Secretary of War January 27, 1862, and continued in the office until February 1, 1863; that C. P. Wolcott, of Ohio, was appointed Assistant Secretary of War July 1, 1862, and continued in the office until January 1, 1863; that C. A. Dana, of New York, was appointed Assistant Secretary of War March 1, 1864, and continued in the office until July 31, 1865. The next appointment of Assistant Secretary of War was that of Lewis A. Grant, of Minnesota, who was appointed in pursuance of the act of March 5, 1890, and who was succeeded by Joseph B. Doe, of Wisconsin, who, in turn, was succeeded by G. D. Meiklejohn, of Nebraska, the present incumbent.

From the foregoing it will be perceived that for a portion of the period between January 22, 1862, and July 31, 1864, there were three Assistant Secretaries of War serving contemporaneously.

Very truly, yours,

R. A. ALGER.

Secretary of War.

Hon. THOMAS H. CARTER,
Of Committee of Military Affairs, United States Senate, City.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator from Montana would state what the purpose of the bill is, whether it is to make a permanent increase of Assistant Secretaries or not.

Mr. CARTER. The bill provides for a Second Assistant Secretary of War during the continuance of the existing war. The office will terminate when the war terminates.

The bill was passed.

ADDITIONAL CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON POST-OFFICES AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. WOLCOTT April 4, 1898, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is authorized to employ an additional clerk at the rate of $1,440 per annum, whose compensation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should be glad to have the Senate consider a bill.

Mr. HALE. I shall object to the consideration of any measure except the revenue bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. It will take but one minute. It is a bill that ought to be passed soon if at all. It relates to granting a cannon to the National Grand Army Encampment. They get every year a dismounted old brass cannon out of which to make medals.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Connecticut state the Calendar number of the bill?

Mr. QUAY. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will wait until morning business is concluded.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will wait until morning business is through.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4682) for the relief of Francois L. Bouillotte, Louisa L. Bouillotte, Mary A. Crowley, born Bouillotte, and Lausa M. Price, born Bouillotte, children and only heirs at law of Joseph Bouillotte, deceased, late of Rapides Parish, State of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 4683) to provide for increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO WAR REVENUE BILL.

Mr. MORGAN. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to House bill 10100, the tax bill. I ask that the proposed amendment be read at the desk, printed, and laid on the table.

The amendment was read, and ordered to be printed and to lie on the table, as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. MORGAN to H. R. 10100.

SEC. —. When any of the islands of the Atlantic or Pacific oceans are owned by the United States, or when they are occupied by the civil or military forces of the United States as a result of war with Spain, or as a necessary means of conducting such war, to be determined by the President as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, it shall be lawful and within his discretion for the President to appoint a civil or military governor of such island, or any group of such islands, with full authority, under such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe, not inconsistent with the laws of civilized warfare, to maintain good order and to protect the lives and property and the domestic peace of the people thereof.

And there shall be extended over such islands and enforced therein such parts and provisions of the tax laws of the United States or of such islands, whether relating to customs duties or to internal taxation, as shall, in the judgment and discretion of the President, be justly applicable to such islands during the existence of the war with Spain.

SEC. —. The currency of the United States, whether of gold, silver, or paper money, shall be a lawful tender in said islands so owned or occupied in the same manner and to the same extent that they are a lawful tender in the United States in the payment of all debts, public or private. And the provisions of this act that relate to such islands, together with such regulations as shall be made by order of the President for executing the same, shall remain in force until the same are altered, amended, or repealed by act of Congress.

Mr. LODGE. I offer an amendment to the pending war revenue bill, which I move be printed and laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the hearing before the Committee on Finance, May 3, 1898, on the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 26th instant approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

An act (S. 4607) providing for the payment and maintenance of volunteers during the interval between their enrollment and muster into the United States service, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 167) ratifying and confirming certain temporary appointments of officers of the Navy.

COMPENSATION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. ALLISON. Is the morning business closed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolution No. 872, introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], which was laid over from yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Nebraska is absent at this moment, and I hope the resolution will be laid over until tomorrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over until tomorrow.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is morning business concluded?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut rose to make a request of the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is a joint resolution that will take but one minute. It will be worth nothing if it waits a week. It is simply to give an old gun, such as has been given every year for a good many years, to make certain memorial medals for the Grand Army Encampment. I ask the Senate to consider the joint resolution (H. Res. 271) donating a condemned cannon to the Thirty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think that is very unkind.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is very unkind.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the joint resolution will lie over.

WAR REVENUE BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 10100.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, when I was interrupted yesterday by the special order I was presenting some facts in reference to the passage of an income-tax bill in 1870, and I had not quite concluded on that point.

On the 24th of June, 1870, while the bill was before the Senate, a motion was made to strike out the fifth section of the amended bill, which afterwards became the sixth section of the bill, and was the provision concerning the income tax. On that motion the yeas were 34 and the nays 23. So the provision was stricken out of the House bill. Those voting in the negative in the Senate were Messrs. Boreman, Brownlow, Chandler, Drake, Hamlin, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Howell, Morrill of Maine, MORRILL of Vermont, Morton, Pratt, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Thayer, Warner, Willey, and Williams—23. I believe I am not mistaken when I say that every one of those votes was a Republican vote.

The motion was then made to strike out sections 44 and 45 of the House bill taxing the income of corporations. It was an income tax of corporations, taxing their net profits about 24 per cent, I believe, at least that is the way it finally passed, and I believe that was the condition then. The Vice-President submitted the question to the Senate by stating that they were two sections relating to the income tax on the dividends of corporations. On the motion to strike out Senator Morton, of Indiana, said:

Mr. President, I was not surprised at the vote that we have had here this morning.

That is the vote to strike out the general income tax, which became section 6 afterwards.

I have expected it for some time, but nevertheless I regret it deeply. I regret it as a mistake in every point of view. Whether we consider it in regard to public sentiment, whether we consider it in regard to public justice, whether we consider it in regard to what is due to the great mass of the people, and especially to the great mass of the poor people of this country, I regret it as a mistake, and a great mistake.

Mr. Drake, of Missouri, a Republican Senator, interposed:

Mr. DRAKE. A blunder.

Mr. MORTON. Aye. It is a blunder, and that in politics is called a crime; but I will not so designate it this morning—that would not be respectful—but I do designate it as a blunder, and such a one as legislators rarely commit.

On the same day Mr. Drake took the floor and said:

Now, if the Senate is so intent upon gratifying this outcry of the 200,000 against a tax that falls upon them that it will continue taxes that fall upon all the rest of the 40,000,000 of this people, let them go on and do it, and then attend the funeral of the Republican party.

Mr. President, I spoke advisedly, at least to my own mind, when I interrupted the Senator from Indiana a little while ago, with the interjection of the word "blunder" as characterizing the vote this morning. Never was there a greater political blunder, in my judgment, made by any political party in this country, or at least by the Republican party. Sir, we have been the champions of the downcast and the oppressed, and of the many against the few. And now we change front to make ourselves, in our taxation, the champions of the few against the great multitude of this nation. I hope that there will be wisdom enough left in the Senate to reconsider that ill-considered and ill-starred vote that they have given this morning, and let the country see that this party, as represented on this floor, is still the champion of the multitude and not the champion of the few.

Mr. Howe, of Wisconsin, one of the very ablest and purest men who ever sat in this Chamber, a man of great conservatism, a very great lawyer, who was afterwards a member of a Republican Cabinet, said on this motion, among other things in the same line that I do not quote:

Now, Mr. President, I do not want to confess to the country that we are utterly unwilling that fixed incomes over $2,000 in amount shall be taxed the small and inconsiderable sum of 3 cents on the dollar, while every man who consumes sugar in this country shall pay a tax equal to about 50 per cent of the value of what he consumes. If it be possible that we can avoid that confession I should like to avoid it. Let me say right here, Mr. President, that you can not avoid a tax on income, and you do not try to do it. That is not possible. Lay your tax on what objects you please, they must be paid out of income. There is nothing else to pay taxes with. The tax you levy upon the salt that the poor man puts in his bread he pays out of his income, out of his daily earnings, his daily sweat, just as much as the capitalist pays out of his income the tax you lay upon the dividends on his stock.

On the 1st of July, 1870, the motion to reconsider the vote by which the section concerning the income tax had been stricken out was reconsidered, and the vote stood 26 yeas and 23 nays. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the Senators who voted for the reconsideration, which was in effect to reinstate the income tax in the bill, all of them, I think, leading Republican Senators, and almost all of them men of more than ordinary national reputation. The list was as follows: Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Hamlin, Harlan, Howe, Howell, Morrill of Maine, MORRILL of Vermont, Nye, Patterson, Pool, Pratt, Ramsey, Rice, Schurz, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Warner, Willey, Williams, and Wilson.

Mr. Morton, of Indiana, did not vote on that question. He and some others were paired in favor of the proposition.

July 5, 1870, a motion was made to strike out of the bill all relating to the income tax, and the vote on that question I shall give. That included the proposition to strike out all in section 6 and what afterwards became the income tax on corporations, taking, as the bill passed, the sixth section of the act up to and including the sixteenth. The yeas were 26 and the nays 26; so the motion did not prevail. Those voting in the negative were favoring the income tax, and were Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Chandler, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harlan, Howe, Howell, MORRILL of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Schurz, Sherman, Spencer, Warner, Willey, and Williams.

On the same day the bill passed the Senate by a vote of 43 yeas to 6 nays; and I shall now read the names of those who voted for the passage of the income-tax provisions, which included the individual income tax and the income tax upon corporations, that was certainly much more burdensome to corporations than the proposed measure in the present bill. They follow: Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fenton, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harlan, Howe, Howell, Kellogg, McDonald, MORRILL of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, STEWART, Stockton, Thayer, Thurman, Trumbull, Warner, Willey, Williams, and Wilson.

Mr. President, I want to say that a careful examination of the debates indicates that very many of the Senators who voted to strike out the income-tax provisions voted not because of their opposition to the income tax any more than to any other taxation, but because the whole purpose of the bill was to reduce taxation. It was supposed that we were collecting too much money and that something had to be dropped out. I recall only two Senators who during that debate made an attack upon the constitutionality of that measure. Among those voting for that bill with its income tax on individuals and the provision that taxed corporations very much more severely than the measure now proposed were found nearly all the Republican Senators in this body. There were many distinguished lawyers, among whom I might name our former colleague, the Senator from Vermont, Mr. Edmunds, and McDonald, of Indiana. Those who had the privilege of serving with McDonald will bear me out when I say that few men who ever sat in this body had more legal ability than he.

Among the number who voted for the measure was that distinguished lawyer and jurist from Ohio, Mr. Thurman. There was that very learned lawyer and very able Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Carpenter, who was one of the two who did express some doubt as to the constitutionality of the act, to which it was replied, if I recollect, by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who still serves in the Senate, that it was too late to question the constitutionality of the act.

Mr. President, later, in 1871, the clamor became very great for the repeal of the income tax by the 200,000 people, as Mr. Drake says, who were paying it; but I believe an estimate made by the Department placed the number of people who were paying the income tax prior to the raising of the exemption from one thousand to two thousand dollars at about 272,000. Of course that dropped some out. I suppose it will not be forgotten that the income tax was on a sliding scale. A man who had an income of $5,000 paid a certain amount and the man who had an income of $10,000 paid nearly twice as much, if not quite that. I remember very distinctly that a man who had an income above $10,000 was required to pay 10 per cent of his income, save and except a thousand dollars, which he was allowed to take out, and certain other exemptions in the shape of taxes or something of that character.

A bill was introduced in the Senate for the repeal of that income tax, and the vote was—yeas 26, nays 25. Those who were opposed to the repeal were: Messrs. Abbott, Blair, Boreman, Brownlow, Cragin, Hamlin, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Howell, Johnston, MORRILL of Vermont, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stearns, Tipton, Warner, Willey, Williams, and Wilson.

Among the pairs announced were the following:

Mr. MCCREERY. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton]. If he were present, he would vote against the repeal and I should vote for the repeal of the income tax.

Mr. NYE. I have paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds]. If he were here, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on the passage of this bill—January 20, 1871. Globe, part 1, third session Forty-first Congress, page 755.

Mr. President, that bill did not become a law. It went to the House of Representatives, when the House challenged the right of the Senate to pass legislation of that kind, and passed a resolution to that effect. On its return to the Senate the legal question was discussed whether the Senate had such power. Finally the Senate asked for a committee of conference, which was granted—which the Speaker of the House, Mr. Blaine, declared was not a conference on the bill, but a conference on the constitutional question whether the Senate had a right to originate a bill of that character or whether that was an exclusive right of the House. That conference met, and did not agree. The House stood by their declaration by a practically unanimous vote, and that was the end of the bill.

Mr. President, I have not read this, in common parlance, to put anybody in "a hole" or in a disagreeable position, but I have read it to show that, after an experience of eight years with a law of this kind, the leading men of the Republican party, and of the Democratic party, too, for that matter, declared almost universally that it was a constitutional tax, and most of the Republican members of this body and of the House of Representatives asserted that it was a just and equitable tax.

Now, Mr. President, how a principle of raising money that was just and righteous in 1870 and 1871 can become so objectionable as it is asserted it is now, I can not quite understand.

The constitutional right exists to impose an income tax; and it is so admitted by the Supreme Court of the United States. The only question now is as to what can be included in an income tax. If, as stated by Senator Sherman, Senator Morton, and various other Senators here, it is a righteous and equitable tax, it seems that the committee might have found some method of bringing themselves within the constitutional restriction as declared by the Supreme Court, and that there might be a large amount of money raised from that source without injury to any portion of our people.

Mr. President, if this question should be submitted to the Senate in any shape, with all my respect for the Supreme Court of the United States, I shall be compelled on my oath to vote that the income tax of 1894 was a constitutional measure. I voted for it then, with a hundred years of precedent before me, with five decisions, as I said yesterday, of the Supreme Court determining the question affirmatively as to our power to impose such a tax; and although the court has held in a particular case that we invaded the Constitution by its imposition, yet I have no reason to suppose that the court may not return to its former decision on that subject. In fact, I have every reason to suppose that the court would, if the question were submitted anew, take such action.

THE SILVER SEIGNIORAGE.

Mr. President, I want now to take up a proposition, which I suppose will be fiercely contested, if the opponents of the amendment offered by the majority of the committee shall discuss it at all, which so far I have seen no inclination on the part of the minority of the committee or on the part of the Republican portion of the Senate to do; I refer to the question of the coinage of the seigniorage. It was asserted here with great vehemence the other day that the silver seigniorage was a trust fund which could not be interfered with.

I challenged that statement then and I challenge it now. It is not charged in any way as a trust fund. The trust fund applies only to so much of the silver bullion in the Treasury as is sufficient and necessary to make as many silver dollars as there are Treasury notes outstanding, and the policy of the Administration has been to, as fast as the seigniorage was eliminated—that is, whenever a dollar was coined—set aside a certain amount of the bullion as seigniorage and treat it as the property of the Government, to be coined into dollars, which went into the Treasury just the same as did the silver dollars coined under the Bland-Allison Act or under the Sherman Act.

It is too late, Mr. President, for Senators who are opposed to this provision of the bill as reported by the committee to assert that there is any breach of trust or any violation of sound financial policy in coining the silver seigniorage into money. We have an unquestioned right to segregate from the one hundred millions of money, in round numbers, or the amount equivalent to the Treasury notes in circulation—we have an undoubted right to segregate that which will ultimately be seigniorage, and treat it as if it were separate and had never been connected with that transaction.

The Treasury Department has sent us a statement that the seigniorage when coined will amount to $42,488,427. There is no difficulty in arriving at what the amount will be. The only question that can be asked, and the only question that we ought to consider, is, can it be coined without detriment to the public service? It is $42,488,427 of silver which, when coined, belongs to the people of the United States; which has been paid for, and has been lying in the Treasury for some years, while we have been selling bonds to pay current expenses. It does not stand as a support to the $102,000,000 of Treasury notes that are out.

The policy of this Administration and the last Administration has been so often declared that nobody expects a dollar of this seigniorage to be coined for the purpose of giving it to the people in exchange for Treasury notes, unless a citizen of the United States goes there and makes a demand for the silver dollar. We issued under the act of 1890—I shall not attempt to give the exact numbers, because I have not them before me—in the neighborhood of $154,000,000 of Treasury certificates. A large number of those have been redeemed in gold and reissued. Whenever they are redeemed in silver they are forever retired and the silver takes their place. Fifty-three million dollars of them have been exchanged for silver dollars, practically, since 1893. The people have preferred the silver dollar to the Treasury certificate, which is, under the policy of the Government, redeemable in gold.

Mr. President, every silver dollar in circulation in this country is performing the same monetary function as the gold dollar, and there has been no depreciation or divergence between the silver dollar and the gold dollar at any time. It has been preferred on various occasions, and large sums taken from the Treasury of silver dollars and gold paid therefor. Nearly $200,000,000 in gold has gone into the Treasury of the United States in exchange for the despised silver dollar within the last fifteen or twenty years.

Is there a Senator here who will stand before the American people and say that he believes there is any danger in coining 42,000,000 more of silver dollars? I do not care how he answers to his conscience or to his constituents as to the relation which exists between gold and silver, whether he asserts it is because silver performs money functions that keeps it at par with gold, or whether he insists that it is at par with gold because of the illusory promise and vague suggestion of the Administration that it may be ultimately redeemed in gold. The fact is before us, Mr. President, that in every transaction of life in every section of the country the silver dollar is equal in purchasing power and in debt-paying power to the gold dollar.

You can as safely issue $42,000,000 more of silver money as you can issue $42,000,000 more of gold. If any Senator will risk his reputation by saying that he believes $42,000,000 will disturb the financial affairs of this Government, I hope he will do so before this debate closes.

We heard long years ago, when there was less than $50,000,000 of silver money in circulation in the United States, a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury made to the House of Representatives that if $50,000,000 of money of that character was coined the differentiation between gold and silver would begin, and that the gold dollars of this country would be driven from it in the same proportion as silver circulation increased; and yet, in the face of that prophecy, we saw year after year such an accumulation of gold in this country as had never been seen before, and we saw net imports of gold in the face of the coinage of silver such as no other country in the world could ever boast of.

I will not discuss that question further. I do not think it is necessary that I should do so. I believe every Senator here, if put upon his honor, would declare that he did not believe there is any danger in the coinage of that $42,000,000 worth of silver which is doing no duty, which is silver belonging to the Government of the United States; silver that, if put into money, which will perform the functions of money as well as any money that can be borrowed upon bonds, and upon which the Government will save interest for all time, instead of issuing bonds and paying interest thereon.

No matter what may be the theory of Senators as to the issue of paper money, they can not defend this proposition here or elsewhere by saying that with $42,000,000 of silver in the Treasury, which will make as good money as gold, we are to keep it locked up there and then borrow an equal amount and pay interest upon it.

BONDS AND GREENBACKS.

Mr. President, I want to go to one other branch of the subject. I did intend to take up the corporation tax in detail, but I have occupied so much time that I shall not attempt to do that now further than to say that I shall be delighted if the principle of the corporation tax can be extended so that it shall not apply to corporations any more than to individuals doing the same character of business which the corporations are doing. I prefer to vote for it in that way, and it will be defensible then upon every ground. I take it that it is defensible as it stands, and I shall vote for that provision even in case it shall not be amended as I have suggested; for it is in accordance with what we did in the acts of 1862 and 1864. I do not intend to discuss the constitutional question, because I do not believe that there is any constitutional question involved.

The other proposition of the majority of the committee is that, instead of borrowing money, instead of running in debt, we should issue paper money to the extent of $150,000,000. I will say that I have not been one of those who have been in favor, as a general rule, of issuing paper money. I know that the authority of the United States exists to issue paper money. That has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States upon substantial grounds. Whatever difference of opinion there might have been upon the question years ago, there is no difference of opinion now. I think that may be considered as res adjudicata, and that we may rest upon it being the law for all time hereafter; that if the Government of the United States sees fit to make money out of paper it has the right so to do.

But we are met here, Mr. President, with this proposition: We are told that the people can not afford to bear the burden of carrying on this war at this time; that we must raise part of the expenses to be incurred by this war by taxation, and that a part of the debt we should put upon the next generation; or, if we do not put it upon the next generation, that we must move it off from the immediate present. As I said yesterday, I think everybody knows that if we issue bonds and make them payable in ten years, they will not be paid at the end of ten years, but they will be much more likely to be paid, if they are made payable now, in a year or two years.

I shall not be very much concerned if the Congress of the United States adopt the policy of increasing the public debt. I am not very much concerned as to the character of that debt. What I object to is a debt of any kind. What I object to is that a people richer than any other people under the sun, a people who are touched more lightly with taxation than any other people under the sun—as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] once said here with great force, with more untouched and untaxed powers of revenue than any people in the world—that we can not carry on a war of this character and magnitude without running into debt.

But, Mr. President, we are met with the statement that the issue of greenbacks will disturb the public and will destroy confidence in the financial affairs of the Government of the United States. I do not intend to take time to discuss the question of paper money or the question of money. I have done that on various occasions here. I will, however, enunciate one principle, which I insist is fundamental, which is, that the Government of the United States has the power to make money, and to make money out of paper, because there are at least two decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in support of that position.

There is, then, no constitutional question involved as to our right to add to the present circulating medium of this country any sum that we see fit, and to make it legal tender for all dues, public and private, or to follow the old system which was in vogue in this country previous to 1862—make the paper money a legal tender simply for dues to the Government of the United States. Either one of these courses could be followed under the Constitution as it is now declared to be by the highest judicial tribunal in the land.

It seems to me, Mr. President, the only question is one of policy. If I believed that the issue of $150,000,000 of greenbacks or Treasury notes, or whatever you choose to call them, would disturb the business of this country and destroy the confidence of the people in the financial integrity of the Government of the United States, I might hesitate to give my approval to such an issue; but I say here and now that I do not believe any Senator is going to stand on this floor and assert that there would be a surplus of money in this country if, with the present circulation of gold, silver, and paper, we should add to it $150,000,000 more. In 1878 we had in circulation $846,000,000 of Treasury notes. We had in circulation at that time, in May, 1878, three hundred and some odd million dollars of national-bank notes. We had also in circulation between sixteen and seventeen million dollars of what we called fractional notes, they not having been fully retired.

Our population in 1878, at the close of that year, was supposed to be 47,000,000 by the estimate made at the Treasury Department. We were adding to our population at the rate of nearly a million and a half a year. So I suppose when we passed the act to which I am about to refer we had about 46,000,000 people.

In the winter of 1878 the House of Representatives sent to the Senate a bill providing that there should be no further retirement of greenbacks. It passed the House of Representatives by 177 votes to 35; that is to say, upon the question of suspending the rules for the consideration of the bill, there were 177 votes in favor of that motion and 35 against it, no roll call being had upon the actual passage of the bill.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the character of the men who voted for that measure. It was not a measure of inflation. We had a law that required the Treasury Department to decrease the greenbacks gradually; it being the provision of the law that the greenbacks should be retired to three hundred millions. There being much complaint in the country that there was a lack of currency for the business of the country, the House of Representatives, by the vote I have mentioned, declared that there should be no further retirement, but that the greenbacks that were taken into the Treasury should be reissued, and that that number should be kept in circulation; and that number has been kept ever since, except so far as there has been an actual loss, which always accompanies paper money and any other money, for that matter.

I have taken the pains to look over the roll call of the House of Representatives upon that motion. I do not wish to load the RECORD with a great list of names, and so I have picked out a few prominent Republican members of the House of Representatives at that time who voted for this measure. I find among the names voting in the affirmative, who were favoring the proposition that no more greenbacks should be canceled, William McKinley, jr., the present Executive of the United States; EUGENE HALE, a member of this Senate; Omar D. Conger, who became ultimately a member of the Senate; JOSEPH G. CANNON, who is still a member of the House of Representatives; Hiram Price, a distinguished Republican from Iowa, who afterwards became Commissioner of Indian Affairs under a Republican Administration; Charles Foster, who subsequently became Secretary of the Treasury; J. Warren Keifer, who afterwards became Speaker of the House of Representatives, and Thomas Ryan, who was later our minister to Mexico and now is Assistant Secretary of the Interior under the present Administration—all Republicans.

That measure, sir, was regarded as a conservative one. Of course it was assailed by a certain class of Senators and Members; but it can be seen by the vote I have mentioned that there was an overwhelming majority in the House for the proposition. It came to the Senate. At that time the Senate of the United States was composed of 39 Republican Senators and 37 Democratic Senators, if you include 1 Independent, who usually acted with the Democrats. On the passage of the bill in the Senate as it came to us from the House there were 41 yeas and 18 nays. There were 24 Republican Senators in the Senate who favored it and either voted for it or were paired in its favor.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What was the date of its passage in the Senate?

Mr. TELLER. I do not believe I have it here, but my recollection is the 28th day of May, 1876. It passed the House on the 29th day of April.

Mr. COCKRELL. It passed the Senate on the 31st day of May.

Mr. TELLER. On the 31st day of May? I think it was approved on the 31st. However, it is immaterial. It passed during the last days of May and became a law on the 31st.

Mr. COCKRELL. It became a law on the 31st.

Mr. TELLER. I think it passed on the 28th, although that is immaterial.

As I said, Mr. President, there were only 17 Republicans voting for it, but a number were paired. There were 10 Republicans voting against it, the vote standing as I have stated, the sentiment of the Senate being 24 Republicans in favor to 15 against, making 39.

Among those who voted for the bill I find the following: ALLISON, Armstrong, Bailey, Beck, Blaine, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, COCKRELL, Coke, Conover, Davis of Illinois, Dennis, Ferry, Gordon, Grover, Harris, Hereford, Hill, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kellogg, Kirkwood, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Matthews, Maxey, Merrimon, MORGAN, Oglesby (two or three times since that date governor of the State of Illinois), Paddock, Ransom, Saunders, Spencer, TELLER, Thurman, Voorhees, Wallace, Windom, Withers. Windom afterwards became Secretary of the Treasury, and Kirkwood Secretary of the Interior.

The question then was, as it is now or will be, whether there is too much money and whether we ought to contract the volume. Can we increase the issue of paper money in this country with safety by an addition of $150,000,000? In 1890, the Republican party having come into power and the Democratic party having gone out, there was great complaint in the country of lack of currency. Republican legislation in this body and the other, both Houses then being Republican, resulted in a very large increase of the currency, an increase very much greater than now proposed by the committee.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that that increase of currency or circulation resulted beneficially to the country and not injuriously, and that we increased it by $154,000,000 of paper money, perhaps as good as but no better than that now proposed. That was the Treasury note. Mr. Windom, who had voted for the act of 1878, which maintained the status of the greenbacks and declined to allow them to be retired, became Secretary of the Treasury, and in making his report in 1890 he submitted four tables, which I will not attempt to read, but I will read the synopsis which he submitted at the same time. It may be found in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1890.

Mr. ALLISON. Eighteen hundred and eighty-nine.

Mr. TELLER. It is the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the State of the Finances for the year 1890. It is in the report that came out in December, 1890.

I should like to read this synopsis instead of putting in the tables, because it will take less of the RECORD. I will read the synopsis of each statement:

Table No. 1. Comparative statement showing the changes in circulation during twenty years from October 1, 1870, to October 1, 1890.

He foots up that there were in those twenty years a total net increase in circulation, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, of $727,760,700, or an average net increase each month of $3,032,386.

The next table is a "comparative statement showing the changes in circulation during ten years from October 1, 1880, to October 1, 1890." This shows a net increase in ten years of $476,089,034, or a net increase of $3,966,902—almost $4,000,000—per month. It will be noticed that the increase per month was greater in the last ten years than it was for the twenty years.

The third table is a "comparative statement showing the changes in circulation during period from March 1, 1890, to October 1, 1890," a period of nineteen months. There was a net increase in nineteen months of $93,806,813, or an average net increase per month of $4,940,358, almost five millions a month.

The fourth table is a "comparative statement showing the changes in circulation during period from March 1, 1885, to October 1, 1886," another period of nineteen months. During that period there was a net decrease of $21,859,498, or an average net decrease per month of $1,150,500. There were nineteen months when there was a shrinkage in the circulation and the remainder of the time there was the increase I have stated.

The legislation of 1890, passed on the 14th of July of that year, resulted, as the Secretary shows here, in a large and rapid increase of circulation.

Fifth, "comparative statement showing the changes in circulation during period from July 1 to October 1, 1890." It will be seen that this is a very short time, July, August, and September, only three months, and yet the net increase during those three months was $68,354,333, or a net average increase per month of $23,784,778.

Mr. CHILTON. What was the cause of that extraordinary increase?

Mr. TELLER. That increase came largely from the fact that there was at that time on deposit in the Treasury Department a trust fund deposited by the national banks for the redemption of their notes. When we passed the bill I remember it was stated that it would be $60,000,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. Fifty-five million dollars.

Mr. TELLER. Fifty-five million dollars. I was about to state that it did not turn out to be quite as much as was stated on the floor. That money was, by the provisions of the act of 1890, turned into the Treasury as a general fund, and the Government drew from it every day current income to redeem the notes as they came in, and that money was promptly paid out and put into circulation. Then there was some increase, of course, by the purchase of bullion and the issue of Treasury notes; a most remarkable increase of circulation. This was largely used for the purchase of bonds, it being the only way the Government could get it into circulation.

If I can put my eye on it, I should like to read what the Secretary says about the advantage of this increase, which he pronounced very beneficial to the business of the country. I do not know that I can put my eye on it, but the Secretary declared that there had been great benefit to the country by this increase of circulation. If we could increase it at that time at the rate of $23,000,000, practically, a month for three months, and then continue it at the rate of $4,500,000, for that is practically what we did for some time, I think the business of this country can stand $150,000,000 in addition.

If you will take the population of 1878 and the amount of greenbacks then in circulation and the Treasury notes and the national-bank notes, and then take the present national-bank notes and the present greenbacks and the Treasury notes and add them together, and add $150,000,000 to the sum, you will find you have not so much paper money per capita as you had in 1878, when we declared there should be no further retirement of greenbacks. The cessation of the retirement of greenbacks in 1878, together with the purchase of silver and the issue of silver certificates under the Bland-Allison Act, stayed the tide of depression and falling prices which had prevailed from 1873 up to that time.

There had been practically no import of gold into this country until we started the business of this country as we did, by saying to the business people of the country, You shall know affirmatively what amount of paper money there is to be in this country, and it is $348,000,000 plus whatever the national banks may issue, and then, in addition to that, whatever may be the amount of $2,000,000 worth of silver purchased and coined into silver money. From that time, I repeat, for several years this country was in a prosperous condition, and a prosperous condition which we have not had since the repeal of the Sherman Act in 1893.

Now, since 1893 there has been no increase of the circulating medium of this country. I know that I now come in conflict with the Treasury Department. I know the Treasury Department figure up a gradual increase. They do that by misstatement as to the amount of gold in circulation in the country. It can be demonstrated, I think, beyond question that there is not any such amount of gold in the country as the Treasury Department insist upon declaring there is. I repeat if you add $150,000,000 to the present amount of greenbacks, if you assume that every greenback which has ever been issued is still in existence and still doing money duty, and then add the present issue of national-bank notes and the existing amount of Treasury notes, you have less paper money per capita than you had in 1878, and you have a great deal more gold and a great deal more silver than in 1878 with which to support your paper money.

If the Treasury Department is correct, we have a circulation now of about $23.69 per capita. I will not touch upon that point, because I understand that one other Senator at least proposes to deal with it, and I will leave it to someone else. I will say, however, that nobody believes that there is now in circulation $23.69 per capita. There is neither in circulation nor in reserve that amount of money per capita by a good many dollars, in my judgment. Now, if we add to the present sum $150,000,000, will we have any more money than the business of this country requires? If anybody believes it I wish he would stand up here and say so. If the people who are in favor of the issue of bonds and opposed to greenbacks put their opposition upon the ground that we will have a redundancy of money, I wish they would tell the American people where it is, so that they may have an opportunity to get some of it.

The most prosperous countries in the world are those which have the greatest amount of circulating medium or are so situated that they can make a smaller amount of circulating medium suffice. Great Britain, with twenty dollars and some cents per capita, can handle her money three or four times over where a country like ours can handle it once. Take France. Through all the depression which has existed France has been one of the places where there has been less depression, less complaint, than in almost any other section of the world. If I were to mention any other country, I would mention Belgium for one and then the Netherlands for another, where they have a large amount of money per capita.

The Treasury Department gives to France about $35 per capita. An intelligent examination of the finances of France and the circulation of gold and silver in that country will raise that at least $10. There is in France at least $45 per capita of gold and silver money, and if the testimony of some gentlemen who have been high in public office is true, there is even more than that. Our minister to France under the first Administration of Mr. Cleveland declared that there was more than a thousand million dollars of silver money in circulation in France. Conservative estimates have never, until made so by the Treasury Department, put the silver of France at less than $700,000,000 and the gold at less than $800,000,000, with their 38,000,000 people.

But take the Treasury Department's statement of $35.47 per capita. Then take Belgium, which, as I said, is one of the prosperous regions of Europe, one of the sections of the country where the manufacturers are doing better than in any other part of Europe, in my judgment. The manufacturers of Belgium are invading every portion of the world. A few years ago, when bids were invited in Kansas for the building of a public building, Belgium secured the contract for the iron work for the building. She has invaded England, to the destruction of English mechanics and artisans. She has $28.49 per capita, and the whole country is not larger than one of our smaller second-class States. Take the Netherlands, another small country. It has a greater per capita than we have.

I am a great believer in gold and silver. I should like, if it were possible, that the affairs of the country could be carried on upon a basis absolutely of gold and silver at an established and fixed ratio; but I know that will not be done for many years to come, if ever. The world, with its activities, is demanding more money, and notwithstanding the increase of gold in the last few years there has been a demand in the world for paper money of more than two thousand five hundred million dollars to meet the demand made by commerce and trade upon the gold and silver, which are not found sufficient. We could not in this country do business upon the gold and silver we have or upon the gold and silver we could secure, and that is admitted by everybody.

The proposition of those who now favor the issue of bonds is that they will be used to increase the paper money in this country by giving the banks an opportunity to increase their circulation, and those who propose to retire the greenbacks—and there is a very strong party in this country insisting that greenbacks ought to be retired—propose to fill the place of every greenback retired with a national bank note. They know very well that no political party could stand an hour before the American people upon the policy of destroying the paper money of this country issued by the Government unless they supply its place with a money equally as good, or at least that professes to be equally as good.

Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate longer upon that proposition. I want to find a little fault with the pending bill, and I trust we will have an opportunity before we get through to vote for what I think is a sound system of finance. I do not mean any connection with the silver question. I ignore that question in this contest; leave it out of it entirely. If we had the free coinage of silver to-day, it would make no difference in my opposition to the increase of the national debt.

I am opposed to the increase because I do not believe it is necessary. I am opposed to it because I believe it is dangerous. I am for increasing the revenues of the Government by every legitimate means possible; and I say the defect in the House bill was, and the defect in the Senate bill now is, that it does not raise revenue enough as a permanent revenue bill.

There ought to be at least $200,000,000 more added to our income from internal-revenue taxes. As I said the other day, and as I said again yesterday, in my judgment the American people will pay those taxes and pay them cheerfully rather than to go in debt, if they are properly distributed and equitably laid.

Is it the policy of any party in this country to increase the interest-bearing public debt? We have increased it in the last five years two hundred and sixty-odd million dollars. We have added to the burdens of the people by demanding of them more interest, and we are to increase instead of decreasing the interest-bearing public debt. If this bill as it came from the House becomes a law, there will be an increase in the interest-bearing public debt of at least $800,000,000.

Mr. President, we hear many complaints in the country on account of the great extravagance of the Government in its pensions. We are told by Republicans and Democrats and all classes of people that we have been giving to the soldiers of this country more than we could afford. Commencing in April, 1865, and continuing up to April, 1898, we have paid interest upon the public debt to the appalling sum of $2,568,351,151, and we have paid to the soldiers of the country pensions during that time to the amount of $2,256,846,625, or, in other words, we have paid interest to those who hold the public debt in this country $312,000,000 more of money from 1865 to the present time than we have paid to the men who fought our battles and maintained the integrity of this country.

I commend that to those who want to run further in debt. You will not escape the pension of the last war nor of the present. We shall pay the pensions that we contracted to pay and we shall pay beyond the letter of the contract, whether it is on account of the last war or the war that now exists. You will increase your pension list. You now propose also to increase your interest list.

Mr. President, the question is fairly submitted to the American people now. Can you safely issue more paper money to carry on this war, or must you resort to loans to carry it on? If that question could be submitted to the people, in my judgment there would not be one out of a hundred who would not say that he believed we could safely issue $150,000,000 of greenbacks or national notes, and that we could postpone the question whether we shall issue bonds until we knew that there was a demand for more money than could be safely created by the exercise of the power of the Government of the United States to make money out of paper.

I do not know how much this war is to cost. I know that those who are charged with its execution and whose duty it is to tell us what it will cost have not put it beyond $300,000,000 if it lasts a year. Will it last a year? It is not likely to last a year. It ought not to last a year. It is not a war of conquest; it is a war of humanity, for liberty, for freedom. When we have accomplished what we declared we would in our resolution, the freedom of Cuba from the domination of Spain, our duty to the world will have been performed and the war will end. I do not mean to say that, having gone to the Philippine Islands and taken possession of them, we shall not hold them until a proper adjustment is made. I do not mean to be understood that we should not take every foot of land that Spain may have outside of her holding on the continent of Europe.

I believe that will be our duty as a part of our effort in behalf of civilization and liberty and freedom. I believe we should drive the flag of Spain off of the ocean, whether it be the Asiatic, or the Atlantic, or the Mediterranean of the West. But, Mr. President, there is no reason to suppose when we have done that that we shall exceed the estimates made by the Departments. However, if we do, there will be time enough to then determine what shall be the method of raising more money. I am not willing myself for the purpose of bringing freedom from oppression to the Cubans to indulge in a system of finance the inevitable consequence of which would be to bring slavery to the American people, for that is what increased debt means to this country; that is what a system of borrowing to maintain the Government either in time of war or in time of peace means.

It was the policy of the Republican party when the war closed to get rid of the public debt. We pursued that policy until 1885 with a great deal of zeal. We lagged at that time, and we have lagged ever since. The present Administration came into power with a declaration from every stump that there should be no more public debt. I know they said there should be no public debt in time of peace. Mr. President, this is a time of peace within the meaning of that declaration. It is a time of peace if we have the ability to meet these expenses as they are incurred. No interest-bearing debt, it was said, should be put upon the American people.

I am willing to submit this question to the American people. I am willing to support the Administration in every effort to bring this war to a speedy termination. I shall vote all that the Administration asks in the way of supplies. I shall vote without whining and criticism to give all the money and all the men that the executive branch of the Government thinks necessary. For one, whether I am satisfied with the conduct of the war or not, I believe it to be my duty to stand with the Administration in its vigorous prosecution until it shall be terminated with a triumphant result.

But, Mr. President, the fact that I feel thus does not deny to me, as I said yesterday, the right to determine how the sinews of war shall be provided. I must exercise my own judgment upon that question. He who does not, he who surrenders his judgment on this floor to that of the Executive or anybody else, does not meet the full measure of the demands upon him as an American Senator. As I said yesterday, I shall not be deterred because somebody charges that we are in sympathy with Spain.

On that question I am willing to leave the record that I have made in the Senate during the last three years touching that matter. I want to see Cuba free. I want to see Spain cease her domination over the islands of the sea, whether on the Asiatic ocean or in our hemisphere. I want the Government to proceed in such a way as to bring the war to a speedy termination, but I shall not surrender my judgment as to the necessity of increasing the public debt or the ability of the American people to meet this temporary demand upon them by a proper system of internal taxation.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I propose for a few moments to discuss the proposed issue of an additional $150,000,000 of greenbacks—or United States Treasury notes. I regard that as one of the most important matters involved in the pending bill.

The first issue of United States Treasury notes was under the act of February, 1862. The highest amount outstanding was in 1864, when it amounted to $447,300,208. Since 1878 the net amount outstanding has been $346,681,016. There has been issued and reissued in all a total of $2,876,020,129, or a quantity equal to nearly 8.3 times the amount outstanding at any time since 1878. These notes are receivable in payment of all taxes and public dues except customs. Prior to July 1, 1879, $1,151,572,362 of these notes were redeemed by being received in payment of public dues and taxes. Since June 30, 1879, $1,477,766,753 have been redeemed, but of this redemption $516,030,273 have been redeemed on demand by direct payment of gold to the holder. Of this direct gold redemption, only $43,310,896 was made between July 1, 1879, and July 1, 1892; and from July 1, 1897, to the present time only $21,523,345 have been redeemed.

But for the period of five years extending from July 1, 1892, to July 1, 1897, $451,196,132 was directly redeemed, on demand of the holders, in gold. An average of $90,000,000 per year, or only $10,000,000 less than the gold-redemption fund, thus necessitating its duplication once a year in that time. During this period of hard times, within the memory of all, the Treasury was treated as the reservoir, and the greenbacks as the instrument, for satisfying the excessive gold demand of our people. This excessive and unusual gold withdrawal occurred chiefly from two causes. In the first instance it arose from the fear that the excessive silver inflation under the act of 1890 might destroy the ability of the Government to maintain the parity of our silver currency with gold. This fear of coming to a silver basis led many of our people to seek gold for purposes of hoarding.

In the next place the gold demand came, to a large extent, for the purpose of satisfying an adverse balance of trade. And by this I mean an adverse balance upon all our transactions with foreign countries, whether arising from commerce or credits; for all international balances are settled and adjusted with gold. Since July 1, 1897, our shipment of breadstuffs and other products abroad at high prices and in great quantities has been so large that it has kept the balance of trade in our favor and brought us a constant inflow of gold, which would have been even greater but for the credit balance against us in Europe.

This large inflow of gold from this cause has reduced the gold redemption of our greenbacks to well-nigh a nominal basis. But the conditions of the past year have been so unusually favorable, especially in the matter of breadstuffs, that we can not well count on their permanent continuance nor make them the basis of our calculation for the maintenance of the gold-redemption fund. Caution and prudence should rather lead us to base our calculation on the recurrence of such times and conditions as we labored under from 1892 to 1897.

Our Treasury notes are not only money of a certain kind, but they are also due bills, evidences of demand loans. As mere loans they are not of very much help or benefit, unless redemption is temporarily stayed as during the late war. If the holder can demand payment at any time, the Government must of necessity always keep on hand an idle fund for redemption purposes. For it occupies, as a mere debtor, the relation to the Treasury notes that a bank does to its depositors or its bill holders. It can not redeem by giving new notes of a similar kind; for that would simply be Micawber-like to give one due bill for another.

The Government must of necessity redeem in coin, and, technically, it can redeem in either coin—gold or silver. If both metals were intrinsically on a parity with each other, then the Government would be justified in availing itself of the technical right to pay in either metal. But, commercially and intrinsically, silver is far below a parity with gold, and hence arises the duty enjoined upon the Government, both by law and morals, of maintaining our silver money on a parity with gold.

The holder of a Treasury note is not only interested in having his note redeemed, but he is also interested in having it redeemed in, and kept up to, the value of our best money, that which is intrinsically highest—gold—for that is of necessity and in the very nature of the case the only true standard of parity. To maintain this parity the Government must always be ready and able to redeem its notes in that money—gold—which is intrinsically the most valuable, if demanded. If the Government refuses to redeem in its best money when demanded, it by that very act discredits its intrinsically cheaper money; and if it insists on redeeming in the cheaper money it in effect makes that the standard and level of value, and the monetary parity of the two metals is gone.

The issue of these demand Treasury notes, then, entails a double duty and a double burden upon the Government: First, the duty and burden of a banker to its depositors or bill holders of always maintaining an ample redemption fund on hand; second, the duty and burden, as the financial and fiscal agent of our nation, to maintain these notes as money on a parity with our best money—gold. In other words, the Government must maintain these Treasury notes both as duebills and as money, and to maintain them as such it must always have on hand an ample gold redemption fund.

But both of these burdens and duties are of a shifting, fluctuating, and uncertain character, dependent on a variety of conditions and circumstances entirely beyond the control or guidance of the Government. A banker can never to a certainty predict or foretell the amount of the demand the depositors or bill holders will make upon him at any given time. In good, prosperous times the demand will be moderate; in hard, bad times it will be excessive, and in times of panic it will amount to a raid and complete destruction. In good times the reserve can run low, but in bad times it must be large and ample, for the demand upon it will be much greater. Our sound banks never kept such large reserves as they did in the bad times of 1893, 1894, and 1895. Their reserves were so large that they derived no substantial profits from their deposits.

And so it is with the Government as a mere debtor to its bill holders. In prosperous times the call for redemption is slight and the circulation is ample. In hard times the call for redemption is excessive and the circulation is nominal. But there is one anomaly the Government labors under that the bank is free from. The Government is never done with redeeming no matter how much it redeems, for under the law as soon as it redeems a note it must at once reissue it. Redemption relieves the bank from the burden, but with respect to the Government as to its Treasury notes redemption does not redeem.

While the redemption demand upon the bank may be uncertain and fluctuating, it has nevertheless a limit. With the Government the redemption demand is not only uncertain, but it is utterly without limit; and it is this fact which embarrasses and handicaps the Government more than anything else. It places it completely at the mercy of the whims and necessities of the holders of the notes, who, as a rule, are governed by their own selfishness.

But the duty of responding to this illimitable redemption demand is further aggravated by the fact that the redemption fund must be kept in gold, owing to the disparity between the two metals and for the sake of maintaining the parity. The Government can not artificially regulate the inflow of gold except by purchase. Outside of this the inflow or outflow of gold is wholly dependent upon trade and business conditions. If the balance of trade, so called, is, as a whole, in our favor there will be an inflow of gold, more or less, in proportion to the balance in our favor. But if the balance of trade is against us, then there will be an outflow of gold measured by such balance. We are still a debtor nation, and for some years to come the balance on that score will be against us. We shall have to overcome that balance by the balance in our favor upon the sale of our products—raw and manufactured—and it is only the excess of such balance over the credit balance which gives us the substantial balance that brings the inflow of gold.

But it is evident, on reflection, that our trade balance rests upon at least two grounds, is dependent upon at least two contingencies—first, on our productive capacity in any given year; and second, on the demand for our surplus abroad. Barren and scant harvests at home, and ample and bounteous harvests abroad, will infallibly be apt to turn the tide against us. And such unfavorable conditions we can neither predict, stay, nor guard against.

There is another factor that should also be noted and taken into account, and that is that the inflow of gold from commercial causes does not necessarily bring the gold into the Treasury, for there is no law requiring any gold payments to be made to the Government, not even for customs. There are, and frequently may be, times when our banks and other monetary institutions are in need of increasing their supply of gold to an unusual degree, and hence at these times and for such purpose these institutions may, for the time being, temporarily intercept, divert, and absorb the inflow of gold arising from our trade balance.

Thus it will be seen that our Government, as to its gold-redemption fund, may suffer from a double embargo—an adverse balance of trade or an abnormal domestic demand for gold. All these conditions and contingencies to which I have thus briefly alluded show how fickle, unreliable, and uncertain, and of what perplexing and doubtful character such Treasury notes are, either as loans or as currency.

As there are certain trees of the forest that have the quality of conducting thunderbolts from the storm clouds of heaven to the bosom of the earth, causing havoc and destruction, so with this currency—it can so easily and swiftly be the means of conducting doubt, misgiving, stagnation, and distress from the storm clouds of the business and financial world. It can be made the vehicle for depleting the gold reserve, for destroying the parity of our money, and for reducing us to a fluctuating, shifting, and depreciated silver basis.

The depressed, stagnant, and panicky times of 1893 and 1894 gave us ample proof of this fact. The lesson of those dark and dreary days, with their havoc and distress, wrought and threatened, ought not to be ignored nor easily forgotten. The memory of it ought to admonish us to greater care, prudence, and circumspection. The rule that a sound business man would apply to his own affairs ought to be a guide to us at this juncture.

Would a careful and prudent merchant, in active trade, short of operating capital and wanting to borrow, take the risk, for the sake of probably saving a little interest, of a large loan payable on demand in gold, or would he prefer a reasonable time loan with a low rate of interest? No one can doubt the course he would take under such circumstances. He would prefer the time loan with its interest rather than the doubt, uncertainty, and anxiety of the demand loan. The demand loan might be the means of hurling him headlong without warning into bankruptcy should the heartlessness or necessity of the creditor impel him to demand payment of the loan. The interest on the time loan is a well-invested premium of insurance against such misfortune. The risk of a demand loan is even greater for the Government than for an individual, for it involves the maintenance of an ample gold reserve, and of the parity of our money—duties not resting upon the individual.

The greenback issues of the war were noninterest-bearing forced loans, not payable on demand. The Government in effect said, We can not redeem these notes till the war is over and we have recuperated from its effects, but in the meantime we will accept them as payment for all Government dues except customs.

This loan arose from and was justified by the necessities of the war, but there is no doubt that the burden of it, prior to the resumption of specie payment, resulting from its depreciation in value, was far greater than the interest saved by its circulation. Of all our war loans, from first to last, it was no doubt the most expensive. Its justification was that for the time being it filled a gap that could not have been easily supplied by a time loan.

But this war issue furnishes us no precedent for the issue proposed by the majority of the committee. The war greenback was an indefinite time loan, and it did not at that time and juncture involve the maintenance of the parity of our money, for at that time we were on a pure paper basis. No reasonable man now wants such a greenback. We all want a greenback payable on demand in our standard money. Our past custom and experience show that an additional issue of $150,000,000 of Treasury notes would involve and require an additional permanent gold redemption fund of $43,000,000, so that the net amount of circulation derived from this issue of notes would not be over $107,000,000 at any time.

This amount, however, is more apparent than real. In good times, with a favorable balance of trade like the fiscal year now drawing near its close, this amount would about measure the circulation, but in such times as from 1892 to 1897 the circulation would be much less, for there would be a constant redemption and reissue going on, with a constant shifting and fluctuation in circulation, and the expense of maintaining the gold reserve would be far greater than any possible gain of interest from such circulation. At all events, the slight gain of interest will be no compensation for the great risk and burden of maintaining the gold redemption fund and for the doubt and uncertainty it will tend to throw around our paper currency among our own people and throughout the world.

The issue of these notes is not called for through any lack of currency or deficiency of money. On the 1st day of May last the per capita circulation in this country was $24.83. A year ago it was $23.01. Our per capita circulation is now higher than at any time since 1867, except in 1892, when it was $24.44—only 11 cents more than at this time. There is an abundance of money that can be borrowed at lower rate of interest than ever before. Surely no candid man will contend that the issue of these notes is called for by reason of a dearth of currency.

Neither is the contention well grounded that an issue of these notes will obviate the issue of bonds. On the contrary, if such times should come upon us again as in 1893-94, these notes would be the instruments that would be used by heartless brokers and money changers to withdraw gold from the Treasury and force us to replenish the loss by an issue of bonds to obtain gold. And such an issue of bonds is only measured by the greed and power of the money syndicates. The misfortune is that we are never through redeeming such notes, for under the law they have to be reissued as soon as redeemed. More greenbacks simply furnishes Wall street with greater means to abstract gold and to force the issue of bonds—bonds, too, that, as a rule, will not go into the hands of the masses of the people. Surely no scheme can be better devised than the issue of these notes to put our Government in complete control of the so-called money power—the Morgans and other syndicates who may desire to raid our Treasury for the purpose of securing bonds.

Mr. President, I desire to say a few words as to the manner in which the question of the seigniorage strikes me. Under the law of 1890 there were purchased 168,674,682 ounces of silver bullion at a cost of $155,931,002, or an average cost of 92.44 cents per ounce. For this amount of silver Treasury notes have been issued to the amount of $155,931,002, of which $102,594,280 are still outstanding, and these represent the actual cost of the silver at 92.44 cents per ounce; amounting in all to 109,355,514 ounces. Sixty-six million two hundred and eighty thousand ounces have been coined, and the notes have been taken up and replaced by silver dollars.

The only seigniorage that can be fairly considered a matter of legislation and open at this time for consideration is the seigniorage on the silver which has been coined and which has taken the place of those notes, and that does not exceed the amount of $20,000,000.

Until the silver is coined, so long as these notes are outstanding, that silver at its cost price is in the nature of a trust fund as to all of these notes, because the notes were based not upon the quantity of silver that it takes to make a silver dollar, but they were based upon the cost of the silver bullion purchased; in other words, for every dollar's worth of silver purchased a dollar in notes was issued—no more and no less—and now, in advance of the retirement of these notes of 1890, it would be a matter of bad faith to abstract in any shape or manner the silver which is their basis. But in respect to the amount which has been coined, there is a seigniorage of near $20,000,000 that is loose and is available and could be utilized. My idea, however, is that the safest way of utilizing this without producing any friction in our currency is to coin it into subsidiary silver, if it has not already been coined.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will it interrupt the Senator if I make a suggestion?

Mr. NELSON. Not at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish to suggest that as to the $20,000,000, of which the Senator speaks, that has been covered into the Treasury and has been coined into silver dollars, and certificates issued against it.

Mr. NELSON. If that is true, that covers it.

Mr. ALDRICH. It does, entirely.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator's statement is true, that will cover it.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no question about that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not understand the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I said that the seigniorage already accrued upon the purchase of silver under the act of 1890 has been coined into silver dollars, and that there are certificates now outstanding against the whole of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. We coined nineteen millions into silver dollars and covered the balance into the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. NELSON. If that is true—and I do not question it—there is no seigniorage that in justice and equity is fairly available. The seigniorage on the uncoined silver will be utilized and coined as fast as the balance of the notes are retired, and that is conformable to the letter and the spirit of the act of 1890. Those notes are based on a given, fixed quantity of silver bullion, and that basis should not be tampered with in advance of their retirement.

Mr. ELKINS. I think the Senator from Rhode Island is mistaken in saying that the seigniorage already accrued upon the purchase of silver under the act of 1890 has been coined into silver dollars against which silver certificates have been issued. I think it is available for any purpose the Government may want to use it for.

As to the amount of silver in the Treasury coined and uncovered by certificates, it was some time ago about $19,000,000; but it is less to-day, as there has been of late a demand for silver.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from West Virginia is entirely mistaken in his supposition that there is any 19,000,000 or 14,000,000 silver dollars in the Treasury that are not covered by outstanding silver certificates. I think in all there are only about $5,000,000 that are not covered. The seigniorage the Senator alludes to, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] states, has been covered into the Treasury.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I for one shall most heartily support the Government of the United States, composed of the executive and legislative branches, in the prosecution of this war to a successful and speedy and triumphant issue, for Congress is responsible equally with the executive branch in the administration of the Government. I shall vote to give to the executive branch of the Government every possible facility which is necessary to enable it to prosecute the war rapidly to a successful issue, and the more rapidly it can safely be done the better. I must be the judge of what is absolutely necessary, and that must not be dictated.

I believe all admit that this bill, in either the form reported by the majority or in the form reported, or which will be advocated, by the minority, will furnish ample means for the victorious prosecution of the war. I believe that is not contradicted. I believe that it is admitted that the measures provided in the majority report for increased taxation—the coinage and issue of silver bullion, over $42,000,000 of seigniorage, and the issuance of $150,000,000 of Treasury notes—will prosecute the war successfully for a year. The distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] shakes his head. Then, if $150,000,000 of Treasury notes will not do it, $300,000,000 will.

Mr. President, I shall not discuss the questions of taxation, because they have been very elaborately discussed; but I want to discuss the question of coinage and the utilization of the seigniorage, and that leads us to a discussion of the law of July 14, 1890. It is well, Mr. President, in discussing that law to ascertain the circumstances under which it was enacted. It is nearly eight years since that law was placed on the statute book.

On the 7th of June, 1890, House bill 5981, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion, and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," was passed by the House of Representatives and sent to the Senate. That House bill directed the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase $4,500,000 worth of silver bullion in each month at the market price, not exceeding $1 for 371½ grains pure silver, and to issue in payment therefor Treasury notes redeemable on demand in coin, a full legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, and receivable for all customs, taxes, and dues; and when so received to be reissued, and on demand of holder exchangeable for silver bullion at its market price equal in value to such note.

It required the Secretary of the Treasury to coin so much of the bullion as was necessary to redeem the Treasury notes, repealed the purchasing clause of the act of February 28, 1878, and authorized the owner of silver bullion to deposit the same at any coinage mint to be coined into standard silver dollars for his benefit, as provided in the act of January 18, 1837, whenever the market price of 371½ grains of pure silver was one dollar.

When that bill came before the Senate the late Senator P. B. Plumb, of Kansas, offered a substitute for the sections of the bill referred to, which substitute required the free, unlimited, and independent coinage of both silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1, and declared the unit of value to be the dollar, to be coined of 412½ grains standard silver or of 25.8 grains standard gold, and the said coins to be a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, and authorized the owners of bullion deposited for coinage to receive coin or its equivalent in certificates, and made such certificates, both silver and gold, already issued or to be issued, a legal tender in all payments, public and private, and amended the title so as to read:

An act to provide for the free coinage of both gold and silver bullion, and for other purposes.

The substitute of Senator Plumb was agreed to in the Senate by a vote of 43 yeas (28 Democrats, including Hon. John G. Carlisle, then a member of this body, and 15 Republicans) to 24 nays (3 Democrats and 21 Republicans). The bill so amended was returned to the House of Representatives and the Senate amendments disagreed to. The bill then went into conference. The majority of the conference committee reported a bill in the form in which it is now a law, and their report was agreed to, every Democrat in the Senate and in the other House voting "nay."

The act of July 14, 1890—and all of that act remains the law with the exception of the purchasing clause, which is the only part of it that was repealed—directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered in each month, at the market price, not exceeding $1 for 371½ grains pure silver, and to issue in payment Treasury notes of the United States, redeemable in coin, and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, and receivable for all dues, and when so received reissuable.

It then provides—

That upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes herein provided for the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals—

Mark the language—

on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such as may be provided by law.

Section 3 of that law reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall—

Mark the language—

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall each month coin 2,000,000 ounces of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act into standard silver dollars until the 1st day of July, 1891, and after that time he shall coin of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act as much as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for, and any gain or seigniorage arising from such coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury.

Mr. President, I opposed that conference report to the very last, and in a speech in this Chamber on July 8 and 9, 1890, I said:

But, Mr. President, that is not the only objection I have to this bill. The Treasury notes are practically greenbacks. They are United States legal-tender notes. They are endowed by law with all of the rights, privileges, and immunities of the legal-tender note, so called, or the greenback. They are the United States Treasury notes, and they are to be issued under this bill in an amount equal to the market value of the bullion purchased. Then they are to be redeemed by the Secretary of the Treasury, under such regulations as he may prescribe, in gold or silver coin, at his discretion.

What does that mean, Mr. President? I warn Senators that this language is fraught with mischief. It gives a power which has never yet been given to the Secretary in many, many long years. Under this proposed law what can the Secretary do? He has a discretion; he can redeem in the standard silver dollar or he can redeem in the gold dollar. Suppose he redeems in the gold dollar. Suppose the enemies of silver who have been fighting it for years and years with a pertinacity and determination unequalled in the history of the world, combine. They bring in these certificates and they demand gold in payment of them. What is it they present? It is a greenback, a legal-tender United States note. By law it is placed upon a perfect par with the greenbacks. It comes under the provisions of the resumption act of January 14, 1875. I say every Secretary of the Treasury we have ever had has done it, and the present Secretary, in my judgment, will redeem every one of them with gold. What are they holding? In the Treasury $100,000,000, as they claim, for the redemption of the legal-tender greenback. Those notes are presented and the gold is taken out of the Treasury. Then the enemies of silver will say, "Here we are upon a single silver standard."

The Secretary of the Treasury will say that in honor the United States must pay its bonds in gold coin, and under the resumption act of January 14, 1875, to continue the redemption of the greenbacks in gold when presented in the payment of the bonds, he will issue and sell coin bonds at just the price he may think is the market price of them, and the silver dollars will remain hoarded up in the Treasury and never be issued. The gold will be taken from the Treasury and placed in the hands of the speculators, and then, when additional gold is demanded of the Secretary of the Treasury, he will have power under the law to issue bonds. To show that I am not mistaken in this, I will quote the resumption act of 1875, "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments:"

"And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding."

On and after that date the Secretary shall redeem in coin the legal-tender United States notes outstanding. These notes will be outstanding, they will be legal-tender notes, they will be greenbacks, they will be upon a perfect par with the present $346,000,000 of greenbacks, and part and parcel of them.

"And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues, from time to time, in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled 'An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt,' with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid."

Mr. President, that is another reason why I am opposed to this measure. It enables the enemies of silver to gather together the certificates, to take them to the Treasury and demand gold and receive gold, as the Secretaries of the Treasury always have heretofore held that the greenbacks were to be redeemed in gold. And the Secretary of the Treasury purchased and paid for $100,000,000 of gold coin, and it has been in the Treasury Department for the last twelve or fifteen years, upon which the people have been paying 4 per cent interest on the bonds issued in lieu of it, and it has been kept there, as claimed by every Secretary of the Treasury, for the special redemption of the United States legal-tender notes whenever presented for redemption. They never have offered to redeem a greenback in a silver dollar, and under this law, whenever the holders of these United States notes go there and demand gold coin, gold coin will be paid to them, and the Treasury will be drained and it will be replenished by the sale of 4 per cent bonds under that act for the purpose of purchasing additional gold coin.

Mr. TELLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator from Missouri think that any Administration will have the hardihood to sell bonds of the United States for the purpose he indicates?

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, Mr. President, I think the enemies of silver will have the hardihood to do anything that will break down silver. That is my opinion, that the enemies of silver will do anything they can to break down silver and to strike down one-half of the money of the world.

Mr. President, every word, every sentence in the remarks I made in 1890 has been literally and absolutely carried out and fulfilled. The Executive Administration has done just as I pointed out.

Now, all the provisions of the law of July 14, 1890, are in full force, except only the provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver bullion and to issue Treasury notes in payment thereof, repealed by the act of November 1, 1893, which was forced through Congress by Executive power and influence, and by the disastrous effects of a financial panic made to order for that purpose.

What has been done under the law of July 14, 1890, by the executive branch of the Government? The Secretary of the Treasury purchased 168,674,682.53 ounces of silver, of the coinage value of $218,002,246, at a cost in Treasury notes of $155,931,002.25, the gain or seigniorage being $62,071,243.75.

On May 1, 1893, there were in the Treasury 109,355,514 ounces, of the coinage value of $141,363,080, costing in Treasury notes $98,874,662; seigniorage or gain, $42,488,427. This comparison shows that 59,319,168.53 ounces of silver, costing $57,036,340.25, has been coined into 76,639,157 standard silver dollars, the seigniorage or gain on the coinage being $19,645,376.

What has been done with this coinage of 76,000,000 and over of standard silver dollars? Fifty-three million five hundred and thirty-six thousand seven hundred and twenty-two dollars of Treasury notes issued in the purchase of the bullion have been redeemed and canceled and destroyed, wiped out of existence, up to May 13, 1893, and there was in the Treasury 5,427,059 standard silver dollars available for the redemption of an equal amount of Treasury notes, and there were outstanding May 13, 1893, $102,394,280 of United States Treasury notes.

I have given the status and the execution of the law, the total purchases, and I have given what has been done. Now, let us examine what occurred between the passage of the law and the present date. From July 14, 1890, to October 1, 1891, there had been coined of the silver bullion purchased under the law 27,652,475 standard silver dollars, and not one solitary Treasury note was presented for redemption either in gold or silver. There is the record.

Let us look at the resumption act of January 14, 1875, requiring the resumption of specie payments on and after January 1, 1879. Up to October 1, 1891, twelve and three-quarter years, only $35,561,418 of greenbacks or United States legal-tender notes had ever been presented for redemption, less than $2,700,000 annually. Why was this? Prior to October 1, 1891, everybody in this country recognized silver dollars as payable for greenbacks and Treasury notes. Nobody ever dreamed of any other construction, so far as the discussion in the Senate discloses, except the remarks I gave. Nobody ever intimated that gold would be demanded for these Treasury notes. Up to that time what had been the declaration of the financial policy of the Government? I will read it. Secretary Sherman, in his financial report of 1878, in referring to the resumption act of January 14, 1875, requiring resumption to begin on January 1, 1879, said:

The Secretary of the Treasury deems it proper to state that in the meantime, in the execution of the law as it now stands, he will feel it to be his duty to redeem all United States notes presented on and after January 1, 1879, at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50, with either gold or silver coin, as desired by the holder, but reserving the legal option of the Government, and to pay out United States notes for all other demands on the Treasury except when coin is demanded on coin liabilities.

There was the declaration that he reserved the legal option to pay in silver or in gold as might be desired. Standard silver dollars stood from 1879 up to October 14, 1891, as the guardian of the gold in the Treasury, as the protector and defender of greenbacks and Treasury notes, and no raid was ever made or attempted upon the Treasury to exhaust the gold, bunco the Government, and get bonds.

Mr. GRAY. How does the policy of Secretary Sherman differ from the present policy?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is entirely different.

Mr. GRAY. How?

Mr. COCKRELL. They have absolutely surrendered the legal option of the Government, as I will show.

Mr. GRAY. How?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will come to that.

What change took place in October, 1891? We see what was done up to October, 1891. The answer is very simple. In October, 1891, a controversy grew up in the State of Massachusetts in regard to the Treasury notes, between the Republicans and the Democrats, and the Democrats were tantalizing the Republicans over it; and on October 8, 1891, Mr. Elihu B. Hayes, secretary of the Republican Club of Massachusetts, addressed a letter to Hon. Charles Foster, Secretary of the Treasury, and propounded five distinct questions to him which naturally suggested the answers that were desired, and this is the fifth and last question:

Are not the present notes redeemable in either gold or silver coin at the United States Treasury? Does the Government so redeem them when presented?

The Secretary answered October 10, 1891, and in regard to the Treasury notes he said:

Fifth. Treasury notes are redeemed in gold when so presented for redemption at the Treasury or any assistant treasury of the United States.

That was October 10. This letter of the Republican Club and the reply of Secretary Foster as a matter of course were published promptly in Boston for political significance and power, and on the 18th day of October, 1891, Mr. Phineas Pierce, 32 Summer street, wrote Secretary Foster this letter:

BOSTON, MASS., October 18, 1891.

Noticing in your letter of October 10 to Republican Club, published here this morning, statement that Treasury notes are redeemed in gold at any assistant treasury, I sent a one-thousand-dollar note to subtreasury here this morning, requesting such redemption in gold. This was refused. If your letter correctly states policy of the Treasury, will you please send instructions to subtreasurer here to redeem notes in gold. An early answer earnestly requested.

PHINEAS PIERCE,
32 Summer street.

Hon. CHARLES FOSTER,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

What was the answer?

OCTOBER 14, 1891.

Assistant Treasurer Kennard has been instructed to redeem Treasury notes in gold.

CHARLES FOSTER, Secretary.

PHINEAS PIERCE,
32 Summer street, Boston, Mass.

Here is another telegram from Secretary Foster under date October 14, 1891:

ASSISTANT TREASURER, Boston, Mass.:

Why didn't you apply to United States Treasurer for instructions when Treasury notes are presented for redemption in gold?

CHAS. FOSTER, Secretary.

The reply:

OFFICE OF ASSISTANT TREASURER UNITED STATES,
Boston, Mass., October 14, 1891.

SIR: I have respectfully to own to the receipt of telegram of Treasurer United States, "Redeem Treasury notes in gold, if presented and a demand made for such redemption;" also to your dispatch of even date. "Why didn't you apply to United States Treasurer for instructions when Treasury notes are presented for redemption in gold?" To which I wired the following reply: "As no general demand had been made for the exchange of Treasury notes in gold, the occasion had not arisen for asking for specific instructions."

Very respectfully,

M. P. KENNARD,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

Hon. CHARLES FOSTER,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

In 1890 Mr. Kennard addressed a letter to Hon. C. S. Hamlin, then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, which, by his permission and by permission of Mr. Kennard, I had authority to use and publish. I want to read a part of that letter:

Personal.] SUBTREASURY UNITED STATES,
Boston, Mass., October 31, 1891.

DEAR MR. HAMLIN: I have the pleasure of replying to your note of the 26th instant. The date of the incident referred to was October 13, 1891, not 1890, as your note has it. When I returned to this office in January, 1891, I found the Treasury notes then in current circulation, and without other instructions they were issued and accepted on all sides as the representative of silver rather than of gold till otherwise advised, and in the language of the law "redeemed at the discretion of the Secretary."

No specific instructions were ever received as to their redemption in gold, nor had the question ever been raised. The notes, it was tacitly understood, had inherited their silver character from the act of Congress which created them and which explicitly directed the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase the silver bullion "from time to time" and to issue these notes in payment for such purchases.

Up to October 13, 1891, there was not a bank officer in town that ever entertained the idea of receiving gold in exchange for those notes. My predecessor, Mr. Aldrich, confirms this. The current sentiment was that they would ultimately supersede the silver certificates (the Secretary controlling the alternative), and this office was alternately supplied with both without comment. Gold notes were then abundantly available for all requirements and always tendered for gold coin without friction.

The exigency for the test of the exact bearing of those notes had not arrived till mischievously forced by the Continental Bank, the president of which subsequently informed me that had he been present it would not have occurred.

Mr. ALDRICH. Who signed the letter?

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. M. P. Kennard. There is no question about the genuineness of it.

Mr. President, since October 14, 1891, what has occurred? Four hundred and sixty-nine million five hundred and forty-seven thousand six hundred and seventy-nine dollars of United States legal-tender notes up to October 1, 1897, have been redeemed in gold and $90,499,954 United States Treasury notes have been redeemed in gold, the endless-chain process—greenbacks presented, gold demanded and paid. They come into the Treasury, and the law compels them to be reissued to prevent contraction of the currency. They were reissued and presented again, until the amount I have named had been presented and redeemed in gold. Ninety million dollars of Treasury notes have been redeemed in the same way by being reissued, whereas when they are redeemed in standard silver dollars they are dead, their functions have ceased, they no longer have vitality, and the silver dollar takes their place.

Mr. GRAY. They were not redeemed at all by the process the Senator first mentioned, if they were paid out.

Mr. COCKRELL. They were redeemed in gold.

Mr. GRAY. Not to interrupt my friend, I only meant that that is not redemption in any proper sense of the term.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not payment redemption.

Mr. GRAY. No. That is the only redemption.

Mr. COCKRELL. They were not paid, but redeemed. The Treasury Department always makes a distinction between redemption and payment.

Mr. GRAY. That was not redemption according to the common acceptance of the term. It may be the Treasury Department's interpretation.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am speaking of the language the Treasury Department uses in reference to bonds and Treasury notes. When they are redeemed in gold, they are by law required to be reissued.

Mr. GRAY. When I redeem a note I owe my friend, it will be destroyed.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator is not a sovereign, as is a nation.

Mr. GRAY. The meaning of the word is the same, whether applied to a sovereign or an individual.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not speaking of the technical meaning of "redemption," for I understand that in the same way the Senator does, but in the language of the law and in the language of the Treasury the redemption of a greenback in gold does not destroy its existence. It has to be reissued under the law.

Mr. GRAY. It is exchanged merely.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is simply exchanged, but they call it redemption. When Treasury notes are redeemed in silver, that is the end of them. They are dead. They have to be retired, and over $53,000,000 have been so redeemed and retired.

Mr. GRAY. That is true redemption.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is payment redemption—true redemption. We see what has been done. Just as long as the United States reserved its legal option to pay standard silver dollars, just so long no raid was ever made upon the gold in the Treasury by the presentation of the greenbacks or the Treasury notes. But when, without any authority of law or justification in morals or in fact, the Secretary of the Treasury meekly yielded and gave up the option and the right of the Government to the holder of bonds and Treasury notes and greenbacks to receive whatever he demanded, then the raids began. What has been the effect of that meek, submissive surrender of a legal right which the Secretary had no right in the exercise of a sound and honest discretion to give up?

To redeem those Treasury notes and greenbacks in gold, just as I predicted in 1890, $100,000,000 of ten-year 5 per cent coin bonds and $162,315,400 of thirty-year 4 per cent coin bonds have been issued and sold. To pay the bonds, principal and interest, at maturity will take from the taxpayers of the United States $507,334,240, simply because the Secretary of the Treasury surrendered a legal right that the Government had to redeem greenbacks and Treasury notes with the standard silver dollars. Had the silver dollars been used, no further raid would have been made, and no bond issues would have been necessary to increase the gold supply.

We are in the midst of war. Patriotism is appealed to. I think myself it is time to show a little patriotism. Some sacrifices must be made. Mere technicalities and pride of opinion should not dominate over the best interests of the masses of this great country. The rights and the interests and the future of the great masses of this country ought not to be sacrificed in deference to a mere technical construction or imaginary honor that never existed on this earth except in the heads of those whose infernal greed and avariciousness can never be satisfied. Why will not the Executive Administration execute to-day the law of July 14, 1890? It is the law now. What does the Constitution say?

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

And again:

He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

The third section of the law of July 14, 1890, now in full operation, says:

The Secretary of the Treasury shall coin, of the silver bullion purchased under this act, as much as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for.

"Shall coin," not discretionary, but absolutely mandatory. Who voted for that law? Hon. William McKinley, then an honored member of the House from the State of Ohio, voted for it. He is now the President. Why not coin the $141,363,080 worth of silver bullion in this great emergency? Why not retire by redemption the $102,394,280 of Treasury notes and take the pressure off the gold reserve? There is the law to do it. No man can gainsay the right of the Executive to-day to proceed to coin every ounce of silver bullion purchased under the law of July 14, 1890, and with the silver dollars coined to retire and cancel every solitary Treasury note and have left 42,000,000 and over of standard silver dollars, the seigniorage on it.

Mr. President, it will not decrease the volume of money to redeem these Treasury notes. Why? Because the standard silver dollars will take their place dollar for dollar. There will be no decrease in the volume of money, and there will be no increase. It is simply a redeemable money supplanted by an irredeemable standard dollar. Why will not the Administration give up some little technical feeling on this question and coin the silver bullion? It has the right to do it. Where is the patriotism, where is the humanity in keeping the silver bullion hoarded up in the Treasury and refusing to coin it?

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] said it was a trust fund. Trust fund for what? How are you going to keep the seigniorage there with the balance of the bullion to redeem the Treasury notes? If it is a trust fund, the only way you can ever make it available is to sell it. Is that what the Senator from Minnesota means, that you shall sell this silver bullion in order to raise money to redeem the Treasury notes? No, Mr. President; there is no trust fund about it. It was purchased; it belongs to the Government. Under the law now existing the Secretary of the Treasury can coin every solitary ounce of it and with the silver dollars coined pay off, retire, cancel, and destroy every Treasury note and put the surplus, the gain, the seigniorage in the Treasury.

What do we propose to do in the amendment of the Finance Committee of the Senate? It simply proposes to authorize him to utilize the seigniorage in advance of the coinage. Under the law of July 14, 1890, there would be no seigniorage legitimately until the coinage had occurred. We supplant that law with the law we have here, which authorizes him to coin the seigniorage as a separate coinage, $42,000,000, coinable in one year or less at the mints of the United States; and as this is an emergency, a war, we authorize him to issue silver certificates for an amount equivalent to $42,000,000 of seigniorage in advance of its coinage.

What is that? That is simply authorizing to be done with the silver bullion what is done with the gold bullion in the Treasury. It simply authorizes a silver certificate to be issued for every 412½ grains of standard silver. That is all. There is no betrayal of trust or confidence or anything of the kind. We simply make available this sum. It simply divides the silver bullion in the Treasury into two parts, sets aside an amount equal to every dollar of the outstanding Treasury notes to be hereafter coined into standard silver dollars for redemption, and sets apart the seigniorage or gain, and then authorizes silver certificates to be immediately issued, equal in amount to the coinage value of the seigniorage and to become available as absolute money at this time, with no delay in the matter at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks the $42,000,000 which he proposes to have coined, the seigniorage, or the silver certificates to be issued, are as good as or better money than the $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes which are proposed to be issued by another provision of the same bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think they are as good as gold—absolute irredeemable money—the only absolute irredeemable money, together with gold, that the Constitution authorizes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would the same purpose be accomplished if we should issue $192,000,000 of legal-tender United States notes instead of $150,000,000 of United States notes and $42,000,000 of silver certificates?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I do not think it would be accomplished.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why not?

Mr. COCKRELL. It would be a direct reflection upon the utilization of silver.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why?

Mr. COCKRELL. It would be in the line of what the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury declared to be the policy of the Government—that is, of his part of the Government—to commit the Government more thoroughly to the gold standard.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand this proposition, it is not intended or expected that the silver bullion is to be coined at once. It is to be coined some time or other possibly, along from time to time. It is proposed to issue $42,000,000 of silver certificates against something which may be coined hereafter, the bullion remaining in the Treasury.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; not against something hereafter to be coined, but against the silver bullion in the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, against the silver bullion in the Treasury.
Mr. COCKRELL. Just as is done in the case of gold—against the gold bullion in the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. What I am trying to ascertain from the Senator is whether his purpose would not be as well answered if we issued $192,000,000 of United States notes instead of issuing further silver certificates.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all; and I will tell the Senator the reason why. The silver certificates are only redeemable in standard silver dollars, and when redeemed in standard silver dollars those dollars are the equal of gold and are not redeemable. If you issue $42,000,000 of greenbacks and not $42,000,000 of silver certificates, those $42,000,000 are redeemable money and create a pressure upon the gold reserve.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator says that the $42,000,000 of silver certificates would be redeemable in silver dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. If we should issue $42,000,000 of United States notes they would be redeemable either in silver dollars or gold dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. We know what that means. We have tried that. We can not be caught on that fly any longer. We know it is gold, and gold only.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does not the Senator think it is desirable to maintain a parity of value between the two?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is already maintained, if the law would be executed by paying out one as well as the other, honoring one as well as the other, and letting silver stand by the law the equal of gold. It is not maintained by degrading and debasing silver and refusing to pay it out. You maintain no parity that way.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the Senator's opinion, it is that a currency which is redeemable in silver dollars is a better currency than a currency which is redeemable either in gold or silver.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I do not say anything of the kind. It is just as good, absolutely as good.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator to say that the one was preferable to the other.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, I said nothing of the kind. It is just as good. The Senator was trying to get me to say that the silver certificates were no better than greenbacks. That was his object. If he believes that the silver dollar ought to be redeemed in gold, then his position is right. I do not believe it ought to be so redeemed. I believe it is absolute money, irredeemable money, its own redeemer, just as good as gold. Therefore a silver certificate is equal to a gold certificate. But a paper currency, a legal-tender money issued by the Government, all that we have issued, is redeemable. There is the difference between them.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of my distinguished friend from Rhode Island to the fact that the present President of the United States voted for every law which has authorized the existence of a standard silver dollar. Every silver dollar now outstanding is the creature of a law which President McKinley, when a member of the House, sanctioned, and for which he voted. No man can deny that President McKinley voted for the act of February 28, 1878, known as the Bland-Allison Act. He was then a member of the House. He voted for the law of July 14, 1890, under which the silver bullion in the Treasury has been purchased. He voted for the act of March 3, 1891, which authorized the coinage of the trade dollars into standard silver dollars, legal tender.

Under these three laws every silver dollar in existence to-day coined since 1878 has been issued, and every law authorizing the standard silver dollar was voted for by President McKinley when he was a member of the House.

Mr. MORGAN. The trade dollar under the law was given the right of free coinage.

Mr. COCKRELL. The trade dollar was given free coinage, but that was soon taken away. It lasted only a short time.

I believe I will read a little of what the present President of the United States said in 1890 in advocacy of the law of July 14, 1890. June 7, 1890, Mr. McKinley said in the House of Representatives:

Two things, Mr. Speaker, have been made clear by the discussion during the last two days. The first one is that it is desirable and necessary—desirable and necessary that the country should have an increase of its circulating medium, and the second, that in providing for this circulating medium the silver product of the United States should be used and employed.

Those were the two great truths established by the discussion of that law in the House of Representatives. After stating the various views of leading members of the House, Mr. McKinley said again:

But all agree that we must have a larger volume of money, and that the added volume shall be silver or its equivalent based on silver.

I now, in 1893, join in the language of President McKinley in 1890, that we must have a larger volume of money, and as much of that volume should be silver as can be conveniently made.

There can be no real objection on this earth to the coinage of the seigniorage and, prior to its coinage, to the issue of silver certificates in lieu thereof. It will give us $42,000,000 immediately, more than enough to carry on the war for one month at the most extravagant rate. It can be done in twenty-four hours. There will be no delay; no negotiation. We all know what it is. There is $42,000,000 and more silver bullion in the Treasury set apart as seigniorage, and $42,000,000 of silver certificates could be issued upon it just as it would be issued upon $42,000,000 of gold if it were placed there to-morrow. It will go immediately into circulation.

Mr. President, we have already redeemed $53,586,723 of these Treasury notes and no harm has come. Nobody has been injured. The notes have been canceled and destroyed, and the pressure upon the gold reserve by that amount has been removed. We can redeem them all and cancel them. We can issue the silver certificate. We make a vacuum of $102,000,000 for paper currency. We can increase the volume of silver, the basis of the paper currency, $42,000,000, and $102,000,000 in addition if the law of July 14, 1890, shall be carried out.

I can not understand why it is that our friends who favor bond issues can object to the coinage and utilization of the seigniorage in the way I have described. I hope, in view of the patriotism shown by the masses of the people, some regard will be shown to their interests, and some effort will be made to increase the basis of irredeemable absolute money in this country, the fabric upon which everything stands. That can be done by the executive administration administering and executing the law of July 14, 1890, to coin all the silver bullion, and to retire all the Treasury notes. That will take out of circulation $102,000,000 of paper currency redeemable and put out $102,000,000 of standard silver dollars irredeemable, and then we would put out $42,000,000 of seigniorage in the same way. Here is an increase of $144,000,000 of standard silver dollars, a basis for the redemption of the currency and the bonds of the United States.

Now, who can be harmed by that? Can any harm come to any creature on this earth? Not one particle, and no man can show it. No harm can come. Why shall the Government continue the meek and submissive surrender of the legal right to redeem in silver dollars as well as gold? When these sacred, patriotic bankers, the money power, come down like a gang of wolves upon the fold of the Treasury and present their notes and demand gold, shovel out silver dollars to them, and I will venture you that they will retreat; they will retreat quickly.

Are the people of this country to be brought to the knees of these gold speculators? Are their rights to be trampled upon and surrendered to gratify the avaricious horde that speculate upon the broken bones and shed blood of our soldiers, upon the tears and bereavements of the widows and orphans of this war? Are they the ones that this Government of the people and by the people and for the people panders and bows to?

In the name of humanity and everything that is patriotic and just, I beg the Administration to execute the law as it is. Coin these silver dollars; retire the Treasury notes and cancel them; widen the basis of the irredeemable money of the country; utilize the $42,000,000, and when this hungry horde comes down upon the Treasury give them silver dollars, as the Treasury has a right to do. Is not this an emergency? We are appealed to here that it is war times, an emergency. We appeal back to the Administration. It is war times; it is an emergency. Here is your power; exercise it in the interest and for the sake of the people.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say something about silver dollars. I hold in my hand Treasury Circular No. 143, "Information respecting United States bonds, paper currency, coin, production of precious metals, etc., July 1, 1897," by order of L. J. Gage, Secretary. It is a very interesting and valuable document. Let us understand exactly what is the status of the silver dollar. On page 15 of this circular I read:

Neither silver certificates nor silver dollars are redeemed in gold.

I read from page 10:

Gold coin is a legal tender at its nominal or face value for all debts, public and private, when not below the standard weight and limit of tolerance prescribed by law.

Standard silver dollars are legal tender at their nominal or face value in payment of all debts, public and private, without regard to the amount, except when otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract.

Treasury notes of the act of July 14, 1890, are legal tender for all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract.

United States notes are legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt.

Gold certificates, silver certificates, and national bank notes are not legal tender, but both classes of certificates are receivable for all public dues, while national bank notes are receivable for all public dues, except duties on imports, and may be paid out by the Government for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations within the United States, except interest on the public debt and in redemption of the national currency.

I read further, Mr. President, under the head of "Redemption." I call the attention of my friend from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] to the language under this head of "Redemption," on page 16:

Gold coins and standard silver dollars, being standard coins of the United States, are not "redeemable."

They are absolute irredeemable money.

Mr. GRAY. Exchangeable.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are money. They pay, they extinguish; they are the end of the law in the discharge of all obligations of all kinds.

United States notes are redeemable in "coin"— in sums not less than $50, by the assistant treasurers in New York and San Francisco.

"In coin"—

Treasury notes of 1890 are redeemable in "coin," in sums not less than $50, by the Treasurer and all assistant treasurers of the United States.

National bank notes are redeemable in lawful money of the United States by the Treasurer, but not by the assistant treasurers.

Gold certificates, being receipts for gold coin, are redeemable in such coin by the Treasurer and all assistant treasurers of the United States.

Silver certificates are receipts for standard silver dollars deposited and are redeemable in such dollars only.

"Coin" obligations of the Government are redeemed in gold coin when gold is demanded and in silver when silver is demanded.

In other words, the option of the holder instead of the United States to determine whether gold or silver shall be paid has been meekly and submissively surrendered and yielded, and the Secretary declares that to be the policy. This was the policy inaugurated in 1891, and the present Secretary of the Treasury declares practically that it shall be continued.

Mr. GRAY. Does not the Senator think if I want silver I ought to have it if there is silver there to pay it?

Mr. COCKRELL. No. It is the duty of the United States, in the interests of the people of this country, not to gratify an avaricious desire of any one or two citizens to the injury of others. If our friends upon the opposite side, if the friends of the bond issue, reject seigniorage, why will you reject it? Because you prefer to burden the people of this country with an interest-bearing bond, nontaxable, for your and your children's children to pay. I prefer, to the amount of $42,000,000, to issue the standard silver dollars instead of interest-bearing bonds, and I shall vote accordingly.

Now, Mr. President, I will pass from that branch of the question to the proposition of the Finance Committee to issue $150,000,000 of greenbacks. As I understand the position of the majority of the Finance Committee, it is that in lieu of the provision of the House to issue $500,000,000 of 3 per cent 10-20 bonds the Finance Committee proposes to issue $150,000,000 of United States notes with full legal-tender power, the same as the $346,000,000 we now have in existence.

Mr. President, I heartily indorse the proposition of the majority of the Finance Committee to issue greenbacks. Now, what is the great cardinal principle relative to public indebtedness? When we analyze all these questions of government, a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, we find that there are great cardinal principles which should be landmarks and monumental guides. Here is a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, a republican Government, the people clothed only, and the only ones clothed, with absolute sovereign power in everything, because to-day they can change this Government into a regal government, a monarchy, or anything they choose in the method prescribed in the Constitution. They are absolute sovereigns beyond any question.

The people of the United States have the right, the moral right, the legal right, in times of indebtedness, in times of stress, of danger, of war, to keep amongst themselves in circulation as large an amount of the aggregate indebtedness, the national indebtedness, as they can keep at a parity, as they can maintain safely as money. Can any man deny that proposition? Can any man say that if he were engaged in business and owed $100,000, and was in a place where there was a scarcity of currency, and had $100,000 borrowed from a neighbor, and could issue in certificates payable on demand or redeemable at sight $50,000, he would not do it? Is there a Senator here who, if he were in that condition and could stop the interest on $50,000 by issuing his redeemable due-bills, and the people would take them and use them as money without any cost, without any burden of interest, would not do it? If he would not, there would very quickly be an inquisition of lunacy, and he would be placed beyond the control of his business.

Why shall not this great Government of 75,000,000 people, the greatest nation on earth, in this emergency issue and allow the people to use that full legal-tender money in payment of all debts between themselves and to the Government and by the Government to the amount of $150,000,000, and save the interest every year upon that amount? What objection is there to it? Why is it that we should not do this? It is the sovereign function of government to create money, to issue currency—mark the language—it is the sovereign function of government alone to create money and to issue a circulating currency.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. Why, then, I would ask the Senator from Missouri, should you limit the amount of the issue to $150,000,000, because we shall have use for more than $150,000,000; and if we can so easily pay our debts, as the Senator says we can, in this legal-tender money, how does he arrive at $150,000,000 as the proper sum?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Finance Committee heard the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and they made an estimate of what would be necessary to prosecute the war for twelve months, and they decided upon $150,000,000. I am simply following them. If I could have had my way, I should have made it $300,000,000.

Mr. GRAY. Of legal tenders?

Mr. COCKRELL. Of legal tenders. That is exactly what I should have made it, and if $150,000,000, as I said a while ago, will not be enough to carry on the war for a year, I would certainly increase the amount. There is, however, no question but that $150,000,000 will carry on the war until after the 1st day of next January, and Congress will be in session on the first Monday in December next.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. If it shall prove true, as the Senator thinks it may, that $150,000,000 will not be sufficient, and under the bill we should issue $150,000,000, how would it be, if it should turn out that the war should last longer than we expected it to last, and we find ourselves at the end of two or three years with increasing expenditures, and the Finance Committee should decide that $500,000,000 more was necessary to fill the gap between the taxes coming in and the expenditures that went out of the Treasury, would the Senator still be in favor of it?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly. There is no imaginable emergency of which I can conceive that would justify me, representing the people I do, honest, intelligent, patriotic people, to vote for a bond issue. I do not believe bonds are necessary at any time—certainly not long-time bonds.

Mr. President, when the war of 1812 began, fortunately for us the charter of the Bank of the United States had expired on the 3d of March, 1811, and we were not hampered by a national bank. Immediately we began the issue of Treasury notes—not a full legal tender, but Treasury notes, bearing interest, running one, two, and three years; and that policy was pursued during the entire war of 1812 to 1814. The last issue was made just before the Bank of the United States was rechartered, on April 10, 1816.

What was the result of that? We kept the national indebtedness within our control. It was payable at short time. The Treasury notes were reissued from time to time by new acts, and in 1836 the entire indebtedness of the United States was extinguished.

Mr. GRAY. That was a very different thing from the issue of full legal-tender fiat money without interest.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that those Treasury notes were not absolute legal tender. I said they were interest bearing. In 1836 the debt was practically extinguished, there being only a little over $37,000 outstanding of all the obligations of the Government.

The charter of the Bank of the United States expired March 3, 1836. At once we began the issue of Treasury notes. We pursued that policy up to 1861. We issued no long-time bonds. We went through the Mexican war; and between 1835 and July 1, 1860, the largest aggregate indebtedness at any time was $68,000,000 on the 1st of July, 1851. We kept the whole indebtedness within our own control in that way.

I do not believe that a public debt is a public blessing. I say it is a curse to any nation. It is a burden, a grievous burden, for any people to bear; and long-time bonds ought never to be issued by any nation which has a government of the people, for the people, and by the people.

A monarchy like England, upheld by their moneyed aristocracy, must defer to that money power and give them bonds never payable and annuities, lasting as long as the Government lasts, to wed them to the maintenance of the Government. But here the bonds will not go into the hands of the sovereigns of this country, the great masses of the people.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. COCKRELL. In a moment.

The great masses of the people will never own the bonds of the United States. The bonds will go into the hands of foreign bondholders and rich American bankers, and they will be a burden upon the mass of the people for ages and ages to come.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not wish to deflect the Senator from the trend of his remarks, but I wish to ask a question simply for my own information and satisfaction. If his theory is true as to the power of the Government to issue $150,000,000 of greenbacks, endowing them with all legal-tender power and all the virtues of money, why does not the Senator move to strike out the provisions of this revenue bill which look to raising $150,000,000 by increasing the tax upon the people, and provide for the issuance of $300,000,000, instead of $150,000,000, of greenbacks?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator said he would do it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I have been here for some years, and I do not think I ever before had such a question propounded to me. Have I ever said in all my life that I was in favor of fiat paper money regardless as to amount? Have I ever indicated that? Am I advocating it now? Because I am advocating $150,000,000 of full legal-tender paper money, a legal tender in the payment of all debts, that is a redeemable money—redeemable at the pleasure of the Government—does that indicate that I will dispense with taxation?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I did not understand that the Senator advocated a redeemable money. Is he now advocating a redeemable money?

Mr. COCKRELL. As a matter of course, I am. I have said such a currency is always redeemable.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Redeemable in what?

Mr. COCKRELL. Redeemable in standard silver dollars of 412½ grains weight, nine-tenths fine, and gold dollars of 25.8 grains weight, nine-tenths fine, at the option of the Treasury, silver to be used as well as gold. That is the kind of redemption I am in favor of.

Let me tell you, Mr. President, under the Constitution of the United States we can create only two kinds of money. One is coin money—gold and silver. That is irredeemable; it is absolute money. You can not demonetize silver, you can not demonetize gold; you can not demonetize either of them. Gold and silver are the money of the Constitution; they are full legal tender; they are irredeemable. The Government of the United States can—and the Supreme Court has so decided—either in time of peace or war issue a legal-tender paper currency. They decided that it could be done during war; and then it was contended that war was an extremity, and that an authority which existed then would not exist in time of peace.

That question was tested in the Supreme Court of the United States, and the highest judicial tribunal, the arbiter of mere legal technicalities, has decided that the Constitution of the United States granted to Congress the power to issue full legal-tender greenbacks and Treasury notes, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States and a legal tender in the payment of all debts, public and private. But remember, Mr. President, that this kind of currency is redeemable and that there is only one kind of money in which it can be redeemed and extinguished, and that is silver and gold.

Mr. President, on the contrary, instead of releasing taxes, my principle is that with every obligation issued by this Government an adequate taxation law ought to be enacted to provide for the payment of the principal and the interest. The people of the United States have a constitutional right, a moral right, a just right, to have as much of their indebtedness kept among themselves in legal-tender paper money as they can keep at par. That is the God-given right of a free and independent people, and it should not be denied to them. That is infinitely preferable to the interest-bearing bond, which is a nontaxable hiding place for the idle capital of the country, where it can suffer none of the losses or the waste of war.

Mr. President, sacrifices must be made in this war. Over 200,000 able-bodied men have been taken from the pursuits of industry and productiveness, from labor, and they are engaged to-day in waste and in destructive pursuits. War is waste, war produces losses, and all the people should bear the losses alike. Sacrifices must be made. We can never lighten the burdens or the losses of the taxpayers of the United States by issuing interest-bearing bonds—never, never. Bonds enable capitalists alone to invest their accumulations in nontaxable interest-bearing securities and to escape taxation, to escape their legitimate share of the sacrifices incident to war, and make the great masses of the people bear all the cost and all the losses of war.

You ask what there will be back of the greenbacks. There will be back of them the same security which is back of the bonds. There is every security for them on the face of God's green earth which there is for the bonds, and every security that is back of the bonds is back of the greenbacks—every one. The greenbacks are backed by the same securities and obligations and means for their redemption as are the bonds. You can not draw any distinction between the solvency of a greenback and the bond, because all the property of all the people of the United States subject to taxation is liable for each of them, and it is liable for the greenback just as much as it is for the bond. Oh, no; that subterfuge will not do, Mr. President.

Mr. TURPIE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to suggest to him that if the greenback is fiat the bond is fiat?

Mr. COCKRELL. If the greenback is fiat, certainly the bond is fiat; and you are issuing fiat bonds, are you? You are if we are issuing fiat greenbacks.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will ask the Senator if the bonds are not redeemable at a fixed date according to their terms?

Mr. COCKRELL. That does not make any difference as to the security for them.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask the Senator if he does not see a distinction between a bond and a United States note, which is not redeemable at any given time, and for the redemption of which no provision is made?

Mr. COCKRELL. Just the same provision is made for the greenback as for the bond. There is not a particle of difference. All the securities that are back of the bonds are back of the greenbacks.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to ask the Senator, with his permission, whether that is fiat which is taken between two parties by virtue of an agreement in which their minds concur, one to give and the other to accept? I do not understand that the word "fiat" can be applied to such a transaction as that.

Mr. COCKRELL. It can not be, and I am not applying it to greenbacks, but in the same way—

Mr. FAULKNER. I am not speaking of it being applied to bonds at all. A bond is a contract, and a legal-tender paper money is a matter which is enforced by governmental law upon the citizen.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a contract.

Mr. FAULKNER. The bond is a contract.

Mr. COCKRELL. So is the legal-tender greenback. There is no difference between them in that respect.

Mr. FAULKNER. No; the greenback is not a contract at all. It is simply the sovereign power of the state which imposes it.

Mr. GRAY. The state says you must take it.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is an obligation imposed upon the citizen to accept and to receive it.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a lawful legal-tender money, created by the Congress of the United States in pursuance of its constitutional power, which has been decided affirmatively twice by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Congress is the only power that can issue that kind of currency or any other kind of currency. Congress can create money out of silver and gold at such rate as it may prescribe, for there is no money without law. Money is the creature of law. There is no legal tender without law; there is no satisfaction of debt without law.

We have the right to issue currency, redeemable money, a full legal-tender money, in paying debts between A, B, C, and D, individual citizens of the United States transacting business within our territorial limits, to pay debts by the Government to one of its citizens, and by the citizen to the Government, and receivable for all public dues and demands of the Government. That is no extraordinary constitutional power; it is only a legal enactment; and I say it is our duty whenever an emergency arises, or whenever there is a demand for it, that, instead of issuing interest-bearing bonds, we shall issue full legal-tender currency.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to know whether or not, in his judgment, the provision of the Constitution which prohibits the States making anything but gold and silver a legal tender was not maintained by all the great minds of the Democratic party up to the last few weeks, not only to be in fact a limitation upon the States, but the enunciation of a principle which has also controlled the National Government, and which did, in their judgment, control it up to the second decision of the Supreme Court, when it reversed itself on the question of the power of the Federal Government to make paper a legal tender?

Mr. COCKRELL. There are some Democrats who held to that view and some who do not. I suppose a man who holds to that view will think that all who agree with him are distinguished Democrats, and all who hold the opposite view will think they are the most distinguished Democrats.

Mr. FAULKNER. In order to test the question as to whether all of them are distinguished under that view, I will ask the Senator whether or not it is a fact that when the first legal-tender act was passed in February, 1862, by a vote of 93 to 59, every single Democrat in the House of Representatives voted against the legality or constitutionality of that act?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know whether they voted against either the legality or the constitutionality of the act. My recollection of it is that they voted against it; but I do not undertake to put into their mouths the reasons which they may have had.

It may have been a question of policy. It may have been that they preferred the policy which had been pursued by Democratic Administrations and by all Administrations of this Government from 1812 to 1890 in the issue of short-time Treasury notes redeemable in one, two, or three years, the notes which Mr. Jefferson said would be the salvation of this country in time of war, and suggested that the States should be asked to surrender their right to issue all paper currency to the General Government in order that the General Government might exercise it in just such an emergency as now exists. He referred to Treasury notes, and said if he had been President when there had been such an emergency he would have insisted that the Treasury notes should have been issued, and that the States should have surrendered that right exclusively to the General Government.

Mr. FAULKNER. I would ask the Senator, with his permission, whether Mr. Jefferson ever indorsed the right or the policy of the Government of the United States in making notes a legal tender? There is a great distinction between issuing notes and making them a legal tender.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator knows perfectly well, and everybody knows perfectly well, that the question of issuing legal-tender paper currency never came up in this country prior to 1862.

Mr. FAULKNER. Oh, Mr. President, it was one of the earliest questions which came up, not only in the government of the Confederation—

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not talking about the government of the Confederation.

Mr. FAULKNER. And it was the evils which flowed from such a system then that caused the framers of the Constitution to put the very provision in it to which I have alluded.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me just a minute?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. I desire to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia to the fact that at the time he mentions when the question was raised whether or not the legal-tender quality should be given to paper money, the fundamental principle was that both gold and silver were open to free and unlimited coinage, but that—speaking for myself, and I have no doubt for the Senator from Missouri and all others who agree with us on that point—if there was no limitation upon the right to coin the precious metals, if we had the right to the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver, none of us would, as a matter of policy, to say nothing of the matter of principle, be in favor of legal-tender paper money.

One other fact, if the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, and that is, while the vote may have been, and doubtless was, as the Senator from West Virginia says, upon the question of originally bestowing the legal-tender quality upon paper money, in 1878, when the question came up as to whether or not the legal-tender money then in existence should be destroyed, the Democrats did not so vote. On the contrary, the leading advocates of the stoppage of the retirement of the greenbacks were found among the Democrats, because it was realized then that the right to the unlimited coinage of silver having been taken away, in the absence of legal-tender paper money, we would necessarily be limited to a legal-tender gold money plus what legal-tender silver money was then authorized under that act. Therefore, the conditions were entirely different from those which existed at the time when the original question was before Congress whether or not legal-tender paper money should be authorized.

Mr. GRAY. Did the Senator ever hear that reason given at that time?

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Missouri will permit me to answer.

Mr. COCKRELL. I prefer the Senator should not do so now.

Mr. President, the Democratic platform of 1868—I have it not before me to quote from it, but you will all remember it—declared for one currency for the bondholder, the voter, and the soldier, and demanded the payment of the 5-20 bonds in greenbacks, the money for which they were sold.

Mr. FAULKNER. That was not the year in which Mr. Greeley was the Democratic candidate for the Presidency?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; it was in 1868.

Mr. FAULKNER. That was the Seymour campaign.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; it was the Seymour and Blair campaign. Mr. President, I will do all I can to support the Government in a vigorous, aggressive, prompt, and safe prosecution of the war to an early and victorious termination; but I will not vote for any bond issue, because I know it is not necessary, and because we here offer a safer and a better means of raising money. We offer $42,000,000 of silver certificates, based on the irredeemable standard silver dollar; and you will have it at once. We offer you $150,000,000 of full legal-tender Treasury notes, based upon the same security as are the bonds which you propose to issue, and you can have them in twenty days. Is not that a safer and a wiser plan? Is it not safer in the interests of the people?

Is it not safer in the interests of the taxpayers of the country? Certainly no one can doubt it.

Now, what are you going to do with bonds? What are you going to sell your bonds for? They are payable in coin. That means, then, gold bonds, as construed by the Secretaries of the Treasury.

Are you going to try to raise $300,000,000 or $500,000,000 of gold by selling them for gold? You say it is going to be a popular loan. How is it to be a popular loan, to issue bonds of the denomination of $25 and send them out to the country?

Are you going to take greenbacks for them? Are you going to take silver for them? Yes; you are going to sell your bonds for greenbacks; you are going to sell them for silver certificates. Greenbacks and silver certificates are good enough to pay for the bonds, but they are not good enough to pay to the bondholder. Oh, no; something holier, something which costs more of labor and of property and of the capital of the taxpayers of the country than your greenbacks and your Treasury notes, must be paid to them. They must have gold.

I want to call particular attention to how these bonds are to be sold. What are they to be sold for? No one pretends that they are to be sold for gold only. You can not get gold, and that is the whole of it. The idea of sending these bonds out to the postmasters throughout the country as a popular loan, you know, is a fraud upon its face, because you know you are not going to get gold for them from the people. Oh, no. It is chaff, intended to make the birds believe it is wheat. It is wheat in the hands of the wealthy classes, who will buy the bonds and hold them. No, no; you are going to sell these bonds for the identical kind of money that we are offering to issue to you.

Where is the honesty, where is the patriotism, where is the sacrifice in that in the interest of the people? Who are to be the beneficiaries of this? You are to sell interest-bearing, burdensome, nontaxable bonds, when we offer to issue to you the same kind of money in silver certificates and greenbacks bearing no interest. You will not have them. You will take them from the people, but you will not issue them. You must have an interest-bearing, burdensome, nontaxable bond, which when the war closes will be worth more than the man gave for it. The bonds of 1925 that we sold here for 104 are now worth 122. Think of what we have got to-day! To-day we owe $347,320,000 in bonds. I call the attention of the Senate specifically to this. Here we have to-day $347,320,000 of bonds; 4 per cent bonds continued at 2 per cent, over $25,000,000. We can pay them any day; we can pay them to-morrow; they are bearing only 2 per cent. Four per cent bonds of 1907, $559,000,000 in round numbers; 5 percents of 1904, $100,000,000; 4 percents of 1925, $162,315,400. The last two issues were made under President Cleveland's Administration.

All these bonds—

I am reading from Secretary Gage, from page 9 of the Treasury circular, information for the people—

All these bonds were sold at not less than par for gold coin or its equivalent.

Mark it!

Gold coin or its equivalent.

You are going to sell these bonds for gold coin or its equivalent—greenbacks, Treasury notes, and silver certificates. But what is the equivalent of gold? When it comes to taking it into the Treasury in the purchase of the bonds, greenbacks, Treasury notes, silver certificates. When it comes to paying the bonds, what is it? Gold, and gold alone.

All these bonds were sold at not less than par for gold coin or its equivalent; they are all redeemable in coin of the standard value of July 14, 1870, which was the date of the first of the refunding acts. The standard weights and fineness for coins at that date were the same as at present, the gold unit being a dollar of the standard weight of 23.8 grains and the silver unit being the silver dollar of the standard weight of 412½ grains.

There is the present interest-bearing indebtedness, and how much have we paid? We have paid $1,795,218,109.79 of the principal of the public debt of the United States and over two thousand five hundred and sixty-eight millions of interest. Think of the enormous sum we have paid as interest, over $2,568,000,000, which is three hundred and twelve millions more than all payments for pensions from April 1, 1865, to April 1, 1898. We have paid $118,145,486.60 as premium upon our bonds to get the long-time bonds. We had the money in the Treasury. We could not pay them. They were not due. We had to buy them.

We had to pay a premium over and above the face value and interest to that amount. Are we to issue the same kind of bonds again? Are we to create that kind of an indebtedness again? Are we to ignore the past? Will we turn our backs upon the history from 1812 to 1890, during the war of 1812 with Great Britain and during the Mexican war, when we utilized short-time Treasury obligations of the Government, kept the debt in our own reach, so that we could extinguish it as we did in 1836?

I must say that this demand for the bonds is unjust, is not right. It is an attempt to foist upon us a financial system which we do not approve. We are not asking that our bimetallic system be enforced in the pending bill. Not at all. We have laid that aside for the present only. We have come to meet you and to give to the Executive Administration of this Government, and the Congress, too, all the money that is needed to carry on the war, every means that is necessary, but we insist that you shall not attempt to thrust upon us your single standard of gold. You know that this bond issue means perpetuation of that system.

It means that these bonds shall go into the hands of the bankers of the United States, that they shall then be authorized to issue national-bank currency upon them to supplant and drive out the greenbacks, and as soon as that is done your Treasury notes and greenbacks will be rushed into the Treasury and we will have a repetition of what was done in 1894 and 1895. The Treasury notes and greenbacks will be used to exhaust the gold and other bonds forced to be issued. That can be done at any time. Now, will the money power take these Treasury notes that we propose and do that? Will they try? Let us see where their patriotism is. We want to put them into the crucible to see whether they are patriotic and honorable or not. They are the ones who have claimed to possess all the honor in this great country. Let us see how honorable they will be, whether they will make any sacrifice or not.

Mr. Secretary Gage, before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, on the 16th and 17th of December, 1897, said:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the objects I have in mind in the series of provisions offered by me are four in number:

1. To commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard, remove, so far as possible, doubts and fears on that point, and thus strengthen the credit of the United States both at home and abroad.
2. To strengthen the Treasury in relation to its demand liabilities, in which are included greenbacks, Treasury notes, and the incidental obligation to maintain on a parity, through interchangeability with gold, so far as may be necessary, the present large volume of silver certificates and silver dollars.
3. To do this in such a way as not to contract the volume of circulation in the hands of the people.
4. To take an initial step toward a system of bank-note issues without the conditional deposit of public bonds as security therefor.

War was not anticipated then. It was not expected that they could get Government bonds then, and they wanted authority to issue bank notes upon other security than public bonds. But now the golden opportunity has come, and they rush in here for these bonds as the first step in the execution of this financial system defined by Secretary Gage—that is, to more thoroughly fasten upon this country the single gold standard, retire and cancel the greenbacks and Treasury notes, and substitute for them national-bank paper currency, and then make the silver dollars and silver certificates redeemable in gold. Then you will have the ideal gold standard—the gold standard of the plutocracy of the world. That is it, and nothing less will satisfy them; and they are taking advantage of distress in our affairs to take this first step in that direction.

Mr. President, it is not fair, it is not right, it is not honorable. Bond advocates say to us, "The Government needs money quickly and at once. To obtain that money bonds must be issued, and if you oppose their issue, then the Government will go without any money, without the means of prosecuting the war to a successful termination." In answer, I say, "Well, if the bond advocates can afford to refuse the Government means to carry on the war, because they can not get exactly the kind of means they want, interest-bearing, nontaxable bonds, and reject better means, safer means, less burdensome means, means that will result in good to all the people of the country and not to the favored few, then they take the responsibility." Our skirts will be clear. We tender you all you want and more, too.

Now, if you have set your heart on it that you will fasten and cram down upon the necks of the people in these times of patriotism and self-sacrifice the yoke of bonds, sell them for greenbacks and Treasury notes, and then pay them in appreciated gold, I say there is no justice, there is no equity, there is no fair dealing in any such process. We will give you legal-tender money. We will give you silver certificates. If $150,000,000 is not enough, we will give you all you need. We want this war carried on and we want it carried on quickly. We believe it is a holy war, a just war, and we feel some responsibility for having forced the war upon the country. I do not know whether it would exist to-day if it had not been for many of those who are to-day opposing your bond issue.

We are not demanding that you shall substitute for bonds the true bimetallic system, in which over 6,000,000 voters in this country believe, in which thousands and thousands of the bravest soldiers you have, marching to the front believe, but we are asking that you shall issue greenbacks, the money in which you intend to pay the soldiers, the money in which you intend to pay their orphans and their widows. The soldier sacrifices his life upon the battlefield; he pours out the richest crimson treasure of his heart, and the only recompense is the consciousness of duty performed and the paltry sum of fourteen or fifteen dollars a month in greenbacks. Never a gold dollar will be offered to the soldier. It is the money in which you pay for all the supplies you get. You know it. Why is it not good enough to be issued now? Every soldier will take it. Every patriotic citizen will take it. Every solitary man who has anything to sell to the Government will take it and gladly rejoice in taking it. Why do you force bonds upon the people, then, when they are willing to take noninterest-bearing greenbacks? I can not understand why, when all the people of the country, with precious few exceptions, as few as angels' visits on earth, are willing to accept the greenbacks and the silver certificates—why will you insist on bonds being issued, interest-bearing, burdensome, nontaxable bonds, an inheritance of burden for our children and our children's children?

We are willing to compromise upon these just proposals. We will go with you steadfastly; we will give you all you want; we will stand in the front ranks, aiding to bring this war to a glorious and successful and speedy termination; but we ask you not to attempt to fasten upon the necks of the people, under the guise of patriotism, the infamous single gold standard, fraught with evil and only with evil. I shall vote against any bill that contains a provision for issuing interest-bearing bonds.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the pending bill as it comes to us from the House of Representatives contains many provisions that do not meet with my approval. Many of the amendments which have been suggested by the Committee on Finance of this body will also meet with my opposition. There are some provisions with which I cordially agree. The reason why this bill is before Congress has been well stated by all who have discussed the measure, and, as its title imports, it is a bill "to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures." On the general lines upon which it is framed and as passed by the House of Representatives, there is not a single provision in the bill which opens up questions that have heretofore divided the great parties in the country. The authors of it have studiously, in my judgment, avoided presenting any question which would necessarily bring on a political discussion or divide parties.

In the outset I desire to state that, in the main, I shall give my support to the general proposition, but will endeavor to amend it, modify it, and make it more uniform and just than I think it is, as it stands to-day. There is one expression which has been made by the author of the bill, and substantially repeated by the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] who has charge of the measure in the Senate, to which I must object. It is, perhaps, a pardonable statement on the part of both the author of the bill and the distinguished Senator who now has it in charge.

In House Report No. 1183, submitted by Mr. DINGLEY of Maine, there appears the following:

There is no doubt that if peace conditions had continued the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury that the revenue for the next fiscal year would reach three hundred and ninety millions, exclusive of postal receipts—sixty-three millions in excess of the revenue for the fiscal year 1896, and more than that sum in excess of what the revenues for the fiscal year 1897 would have been if it had not been for anticipatory importations in the last four months of the latter year, to avoid the increased duties of the new tariff—would have been more than realized, and these receipts would have fully met the expenditures for the next fiscal year if it had not been for the increase caused by the difficulties with Spain, inasmuch as the expenditures for the fiscal year 1896, exclusive of postal expenditures paid by postal revenue, were only three hundred and fifty-two millions, and for the fiscal year 1897 only three hundred and sixty-five millions.

And in his speech in the Senate on May 16, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said:

In the first place this bill is here only because the Government of the United States is involved in a war with a foreign country. If there were no war, there would be no necessity for this bill.—Record, page 3337.

These statements, that the revenue laws as they exist would have furnished a sufficient amount to meet the demands of the Treasury but for the war, are pardonable on the part of these gentlemen, one of whom is the father and the other the sponsor of the measure known as the Dingley Act. The fact is that the measure known as the McKinley Act, the measure known as the Wilson Act, and the law known as the Dingley Act, were each and all of them failures in the matter of producing sufficient revenue to meet the expenditures of this Government in times of peace. It was not the intention of the authors of those measures that they should produce a deficiency; but the fact still remains that each of the three acts I have named failed to produce a sufficient amount of revenue. I will not discuss the "ifs" and the "ands" and the "buts" which have been offered as excuses for those failures. Whether it be the changed conditions in commercial affairs, whether it be the decisions—and, in my judgment, the outrageous decisions—of the court of final resort, or what not, we must recognize the fact that other sources than the public revenues have been resorted to to furnish a sufficient balance to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government.

During the time that the Wilson Act was in operation we sold bonds, and under the Dingley Act we expended the large sums received from the sale of the Government's interest in the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. President, in addition to those failures, there come now, as the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has just said, war expenditures, great and enormous. No man can measure the full expense that is to be incurred because of the war. The Senator from Missouri has well stated that he and others on this side of the Chamber, in connection with those on the other side, are responsible for the early and prompt action in declaring war. War is upon us. Great expenditures confront us and must be met.

I will not permit any party consideration to stay me from voting the last dollar and providing for all the men necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. Additional taxes must be collected. It is admitted by the authors of the bill that one hundred millions per annum, in addition to the amount which will be produced by the Dingley Act, are to be levied by this measure. The Committee on Finance of the Senate, as I understand, as stated by the distinguished Senator from Iowa, has agreed unanimously that the amount of levy shall be increased or ought to be increased to $150,000,000 per annum, and some members of the committee think it wise to levy even a greater amount than that sum.

This is a great sum of money to be taken from our people at a time when we are just emerging from commercial conditions that have hung like a pall over our land since 1893. In framing the bill now made necessary, and the burden of which our people will bear cheerfully, it should be so constructed, in my judgment, as to distribute the burden as fairly as possible, so that all interests may pay their fair proportion of this enormous tax. I do not believe the bill as it came to us, nor with the amendments proposed, would be exactly fair and just, and it may be said here—and truly said—that no tax bill that has been framed, or will be framed, will bear equally and justly upon all interests. But as I understand this measure, you have levied upon a small number of articles—tobacco and beer and a few kindred articles—taxes disproportionate to the remainder of the bill, and in its framework there has not been levied upon the interests that are owned by individuals, associations, or corporations a fair and just tax.

Mr. President, I do not believe that this bill ought to become a law except when framed upon lines of simplicity and fairness. I do not believe that a measure which spreads out the network of the Internal Revenue Department as we had it from 1862 to 1870, which would require the employment of an army of officials to enter the threshold of every shop and look into every orphan's court and into every railroad office, and then follow every citizen who gives a note or receipt in order to require them all to contribute a small amount to swell the aggregate, which thus impedes business and obstructs enterprise, ought to be enacted into a law. Above all things, I wish to say to my friends on this side of the Chamber, who have not had, as I have had, personal experience with the management of a great machine of the Treasury Department, armed with agents to enter all avenues of trade, all places of business, and threaten persons as they perform their duties, that it is a monstrous power which you are creating. To do that I believe is against the best interests of the people, besides being unnecessary and unwise.

Senators talk of corporations and their power. I believe that corporations should be restrained. Their power in politics is great, and they use it now without restraint, mercilessly and selfishly. The Democracy heroically confronted that power from 1865 to 1894; but we had a greater power to meet and overthrow, and that was the power that came from the excessive number of officers employed under the provisions contained in the revenue acts. There never was a Democrat whose voice was heard or whose counsel was listened to from the day of the enactment of the measure of 1862, which was necessary to save the life of the nation, who did not insist that the revenues to support the Government must come from tariff taxation and upon a few articles such as whisky and tobacco, and that this system, which was a necessity of the war, should be eliminated and stricken down, so as to let the American people assert themselves without Government control when it came to elections.

Mr. President, I remember it well. I have seen something of the operation of revenue laws. I have participated in their administration. I know full well the power that the party in control will have under such an enactment. Hence it is, sir, that I shall insist, so far as my voice and vote enable me to so make my impress upon this bill, that it shall be practically limited to levying revenue from organizations, associations, corporations, and large interests that can make their returns to the collectors of internal revenue under oath each month, which would make it unnecessary for a great increase in the number of officials. I shall insist, so far as I can, that the corporations not now taxed and not embraced within the measure as it came to us shall pay their fair share of this burden, and that, in whatever exemptions there are, we shall exempt the masses of the people from the burdensome, annoying, and offensive stamp tax upon their ordinary transactions.

Sir, think of it! Within the pages of this bill as reported to us from the Committee on Finance it is provided that a failure to place a stamp upon an instrument of writing, upon a receipt, or upon a bill of lading subjects the man who thus offends to a fine double and treble the amount of the value of the transaction in many cases, and this is to be done at the ipso dixit of any of the officers who are to be appointed, and, as many of them of necessity will be appointed because of their political activity, they will have the opportunity to use this power for party advantage. The unoffending and honest business man or farmer can be dragged to a United States court, where, if they make a case against him, he will be indicted, and such a case can easily be made if it is the will of the officer and the desire of his principal to control a community. Senators, think of it! This amendment, for the first time in our legislation, proposes that a Federal court shall have the right to imprison him or fine him.

Mr. LINDSAY. Or both.

Mr. GORMAN. Or both.

Mr. President, not only that, but if you pass this amendment, in order to make it palatable or as an excuse for proposing it, corporations are included in the penalty of fine and imprisonment. I am one of the very few members of this body who do not practice law. I am not a lawyer, and therefore I can at all times speak my mind freely about judges and courts. I should like to have some lawyer in the body tell me how under that provision you will indict and convict a corporation and send the corporation to prison.

If you provided for the officer who neglected to affix the stamp, you might reach him, but that is not the provision. The result of it would be, in my judgment, that nobody would be convicted and sent to jail except the poor fellow who had neither money nor friends and whose presence at home was not desired by the dominant political powers. That provision ought not to remain in the bill. I hope yet that the Senate—the only place where we can deliberate and discuss measures, and where we have on all occasions heretofore deliberated and discussed them—will agree unanimously that the whole provision for a stamp tax upon the ordinary business of the country shall be abandoned. Place it upon patent medicines and wares of like kind, but leave the masses of our people free from it. They pay enough now.

Under our Federal system of taxation the ordinary consumer, who does not own stock in a corporation or run a large business, pays now upon his consumption more than his full share. Therefore, collect a fair proportion of these $150,000,000 from the corporations. I have no desire to place a tax that is excessive and unjust upon corporations, simply because they are corporations, or impose a tax that will annoy them in their business enterprises. I would, however, make them pay their full share of the amount that is necessary to sustain their Government. Aye, sir, where a corporation has special privileges or a monopoly because of its location, I would make the tax greater than the one I would lay upon the ordinary consumer and ordinary business man. There is nothing new in this rule. It has been applied before. It has met with the approval of everybody. It was never questioned, because a case never has been taken to the Supreme Court, for nobody in the Union who was connected with one of these corporations was brave enough to go, during that grave period from 1862 to 1870, before the courts and test the validity of such an act.

No corporation upon which a fair tax is levied now will have the hardihood to go to the Supreme Court and test the constitutionality of a fair tax upon its gross receipts. But if such a case should reach the Supreme Court, and if the practice and the theory and the power heretofore exercised by this Government to place such taxes upon corporations should be declared to be unconstitutional, as was decided in that extraordinary and I think outrageous decision in the case of the income tax, the sooner we know it the better. Now is the time to make the test, when we are engaged in a foreign war. Now is the time to let that court, if such may be its opinion, render such a decision. It would not destroy our financial structure, but it would destroy the power of the court to render such a decision again, for the American people would change their Constitution so as to enable us in a time of war to levy taxes fairly upon all interests that share in the government of the country.

Mr. President, amendment No. 177, reported to the bill by the Committee on Finance, attempts to levy a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent upon the gross receipts of railroad companies and the various companies named in that amendment, and then in a general clause it levies the identical tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent on every business association, no matter of what kind, great or small. The provision would embrace in its operation small business corporations engaged in conducting the ordinary trade of a city, town, or county. That provision is, I think, unjust and unfair and entirely unnecessary. The extent of its operation was so completely described by the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that I do not believe there are many Senators in this body who will agree to vote for it.

I have prepared a substitute for the entire section. While my amendment is not perfect in covering possibly all corporations that ought to be taxed, it names that class of corporations which are abundantly able to pay a fair proportion of the $150,000,000 that we are to levy and collect. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment which I propose as a substitute for amendment No. 177, except as to the exception noted at the top of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MALLORY in the chair). The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the word "corporations," in line 4, page 59, down to and including line 9, page 61, and all from the word "and," in line 17, page 61, down to and including line 24, page 62, and insert:

That from and after the passage of this act every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing, or having the care or management of any railroad, street railroad, sleeping car, steamboat, ship, or other vessel, engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or freight for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, or carrying on or doing an express business, or having the care or management of any telegraphic or telephone line by which telegraphic or telephone dispatches or messages are received or transmitted, or carrying on or doing the business of furnishing gas, electric light, electric power, steam heat, or steam power, or refining petroleum, or refining sugar, or owning or controlling any pipe line for transporting oil or other products, whose gross annual receipts exceed $50,000, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax equivalent to one-half of 1 per cent on the gross amount of all receipts of such persons, firms, corporations, and companies in their respective businesses: Provided, That the assessment hereby made shall not include any amount for the receipts for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails between the United States and any foreign port; but such tax shall be levied for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails from a port within the United States through a foreign territory to a port within the United States, and shall be assessed upon and collected from persons, firms, companies, or corporations within the United States receiving hire or pay for such transportation of persons, freight, or mails.

And a true and accurate return of the amount of gross receipts as aforesaid shall be made and rendered monthly by each of such associations, corporations, companies, or persons to the collector of the district in which any such association, corporation, or company may be located, or in which such person has his place of business. Such return shall be verified under oath by the person making the same, or in case of corporations by the president or chief officer thereof. Any person failing or refusing to make return as aforesaid, or who shall make a false or fraudulent return, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000 for each and every false or fraudulent return.

Mr. GORMAN. I shall ask that that amendment be printed in the usual form of amendments, and that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. GORMAN. Now, Mr. President, it will be noted that my amendment provides that the corporations named shall bear a tax of one-half of 1 per cent per annum upon their gross receipts. I do this for the reason that I desire to see eliminated the provision in relation to stamp taxes on receipts and waybills and all other stamp taxes connected with these corporations, and to have them pay directly into the Treasury monthly one-half of 1 per cent upon their gross receipts.

The provision of the bill as it stands would require, for instance, a railroad company, when you ship a bill of goods to Florida, to give you a receipt and place a stamp upon the receipt, and then for each copy of the waybill and manifest to have a stamp. In an ordinary transaction it would amount to not less than three or four stamps on every single shipment of goods made, and would be not only an annoyance and a heavy tax, but an impediment to trade and to business. All of this can be eliminated if a tax of one-half of 1 per cent is placed upon the gross receipts.

Mr. President, this is not an unusual tax. It is a tax much lighter, and it ought to be lighter, than was imposed from 1862 to 1870. I will insert a statement in the RECORD with my remarks, showing the operation of the tax during that period.

The annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, states that the gross receipts from railroads for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, and 1870, were as follows:

Fiscal year.	Gross receipts.	Remarks.
1863.....	$1,108,817.02	Act of 1862: On steam, 3 per cent on gross receipts from passengers; other power, 1½ per cent.
1864.....	2,127,249.69
1865.....	5,917,293.51	Act June 30, 1864: 2½ per cent on gross receipts generally.
1866.....	7,614,448.13
1867.....	4,128,255.24	Act July 13, 1866: 2½ per cent on gross receipts from passengers and mails.
1868.....	3,184,837.19
1869.....	3,255,487.20
1870.....	3,732,209.24
Total.....	$1,010,007.22

In addition to the gross-receipts tax, there was levied a tax on dividends of corporations, which included payment of interest on bonds as well as dividends on stock: Under act of 1862, 3 per cent; under act of 1864, 5 per cent; under act of 1866, 5 per cent.

From the foregoing table it will appear that we taxed the gross receipts of steam railroads 3 per cent, and when operated by any other power than steam, 1½ per cent. Then in 1864 it was reduced to 2½ per cent, and in 1866 to 2½ per cent on the gross receipts from passengers and from mails only. During that period, from 1862 to 1870, these railroads paid into the Treasury of the United States $31,000,000 on account of these taxes. But the act of 1863 did not stop here, with the taxation of the gross receipts of railroads. It imposed a tax of 3 per cent in 1862 and 5 per cent in 1864 and 1865 upon every dividend in addition to the gross receipts. Every dividend made by any railroad company, whether it was the payment of the coupons on their bonds or a dividend paid to stockholders, was taxed 5 per cent, and yet no railroad complained and no question was made as to its legality.

Mr. President, it is impossible for me to say how much money this one-half of 1 per cent would produce on the corporations enumerated in the amendment. I believe there is no question that from railroads propelled by steam about five and a half million dollars per annum would be collected.

From the best information I can get about telegraph companies, their receipts in 1897 were $30,280,641. A tax of one-half of 1 per cent on that amount would yield a revenue of about $151,000.

The receipts of street railroads in 1896 were about $116,000,000. A tax of one-half of 1 per cent on that amount would mean a revenue of about $581,000.

Of the telephone companies, the receipts of the American Bell Telephone Company in 1896 were $5,547,429, and it is safe to say that the receipts of the local companies added to this amount would swell the total gross receipts to $25,000,000.

We would also have a tax on the gross receipts of gas companies, electric-power companies, companies engaged in refining petroleum, refining sugar, etc., so that it is perfectly safe to say that we would collect from the corporations, if my amendment should be adopted, from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 without doing injustice to a single corporation.

I have left outside of this tax, under the exemption clause, all the small companies and associations of the kind described whose gross receipts are less than $250,000 per annum. I have done that for several reasons. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY] called sharp attention to the fact that this tax upon the corporations which are dealing in agricultural products alone would be embarrassing to a great interest in his State. He referred especially to the sugar refiners on the plantations. Then there are small street railways in cities and towns whose gross receipts are less than $250,000 per annum, which would not be able to bear this tax; but upon the companies owning the great lines of travel, the great organizations which have special privileges or monopolies, in my judgment it would be a comparatively light tax.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who addressed the Senate upon this subject, extremely earnest and able as he always is in the discussion of any question, thought a tax on the gross receipts of corporations was unjust and unfair; that there were times and there were cases when under the provisions of the bill the losses of a corporation would be taxed, because there were no net profits, and therefore it would work a hardship. That is true. But that is also true of a hundred other provisions in this bill. It is unavoidable. You place a tax upon the man who manufactures tobacco and require him to pay a fixed amount for conducting his business and an extraordinary amount for the material he uses; and there are hundreds, if not thousands, of such persons and corporations who in the last three years have had no net revenue; and yet they are to pay the fixed amount without regard to their profits.

I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut, and others who oppose any gross-receipts tax on corporations, why the same rule should not be applied to the corporation which is necessarily and unavoidably applied to the individual? There is no injustice in it. It may be unfortunate in the particular cases which are described, but there is no departure from the rule, which runs through all such legislation, whether it be taxation upon imports or taxation upon our domestic products.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate further in regard to the details of this bill. As has been well said by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] and so forcibly stated by my friend from Indiana on my right [Mr. TURPIE], in this emergency we want to give to the Government all the money and all the men necessary to conduct this war to a speedy and victorious conclusion. As the Senator from Indiana well said, it is only the methods, the manner of framing the provisions for raising money, about which we differ. There is no substantial difference on party lines upon the questions which I have already discussed. The great question which very sharply divides this Chamber is how and to what extent we shall provide the money which must be had now, immediately, to relieve the condition of the Treasury. There is no contest; it is not questioned by anybody that money must be placed in the Treasury, and at once, to meet the urgent necessities which have arisen because of the expenditures of this war.

How shall we make provision to put the money into the Treasury? The first suggestion which comes from a majority of the Committee on Finance is to anticipate the coinage of the seigniorage in the Treasury and issue $42,000,000 of notes based upon the calculation which would give you that amount in silver in the Treasury if the bullion now in the Treasury were coined.

As a separate proposition, when it was discussed upon its merits,

I voted for the coinage of the seigniorage. Congress tried that experiment during an Administration which was placed in power by the Democratic party, but the bill was vetoed. After that veto there came into power a party which is unalterably opposed to the theory of the Democratic party upon that question, a party which concurred with Mr. Cleveland that it was unsafe and unwise to swell our circulating medium of that character; and it is known not only to-day, but it was known when we voted for the resolution declaring war against Spain, that there was no power, even if it was wise to do so on the part of the Senate, to force upon a coordinate branch of the Government a provision of law which has been a subject of political contention for the last eight years.

While this bill, as I said a moment ago, as it was originally framed, does not trench upon any single political question or upon any idea purely political, in my judgment it would be unwise, it would be fruitless, to attempt to force such a political question to the front when we have the Spanish army and the Spanish navy yet to deal with. That is a question which we ought to settle in times of peace.

Mr. President, I think I am as close an adherent to and as loyal a follower of my political banner as any man within the sound of my voice. I believe in government by party. I believe in government by the Democratic party. I have fought for its doctrines, submitted to its declarations, and adhered to its candidates when many of them did not meet the full accord of my judgment; but when it comes to a crisis like this, I do not know my party; I know only what I believe to be the best interests of my country. Therefore, sir, knowing this provision to be one upon which there is a sharp political division, I can not vote for it, no matter how just and proper it may be in itself.

It is said we propose to issue bonds. Mr. President, of course it is proposed to issue bonds. Why not issue bonds? What declaration has ever been made by any political party against issuing bonds in time of war? What war was ever conducted without issuing bonds, and issuing them in the very beginning of the conflict? Before the first gun was fired at Sumter in the war of the rebellion we began to issue bonds, and we also issued $450,000,000 of greenbacks as a war measure. What were the conditions? Gold and silver had disappeared; they could not be found or followed into their hiding places; there were no national banks, and the State banks had disappeared, or, at least, they were useless so far as the purposes of the Government were concerned.

An enlarged currency was necessary. The act of July 11, 1862, authorized the issue of $450,000,000 of greenbacks or legal-tender notes, and this was the only issue authorized. They were receivable at the Treasury for all dues and were then reissued time and again; but the total amount outstanding at any one time was not over $450,000,000. There were:

Old demand notes	$60,000,000
One and two year notes, bearing 5 per cent interest	211,000,000
Compound-interest notes, bearing 6 per cent interest	266,000,000

The total amount of notes issued by the Treasury from 1861 to 1869 was as follows:

Demand notes	$392,070
United States notes (greenbacks)	427,768,499
Fractional currency	26,057,469
Matured debt, interest ceased	1,373,920
Unpaid requisitions	660,900

Total 456,252,858

While from 1861 to 1869 the debt bearing interest was $2,351,699,479.

Mr. President, it is said that the great cormorants of the moneyed institutions are now after these bonds; that they are the men who urge their issuance. Yes; but the man with money, whether he be a small or a large holder, can only get bonds by paying his money for them, loaning it to the Government on a security as good as gold or silver, and the bonds will be paid when they become due.

Why should Senators on this side of the Chamber, why should the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], denounce the issuance of bonds in time of war? Our party convention, which met at a time when every Democrat was incensed at the action of a man whom we had elected President, who had asked us to issue gold bonds so as to save $16,000,000—a proposition which was rejected—passed a resolution, not against bonds as bonds, but only against the issuance of bonds in time of peace.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], who had probably more to do with the framing of that declaration than anybody else—at least we hold him responsible, whether he was actually so or not—is too astute a politician to have put any other declaration in that platform. He would not have gone before the people of the country in that campaign with the candidate who was our nominee and the platform upon which he ran, a campaign which was a campaign of appeal to the masses of the people, with a declaration that the Government should not have the right in time of war to issue bonds to save the life of the nation.

I will refer to what we did on this side in 1862, 1864, and 1865, and will insert in the RECORD the list of the bonds that were issued.

According to the statement of the public debt published October 31, 1865, the interest-bearing debt of the United States on that date was as follows:

But in 1861, as Senators know—and I refer to it with great kindness—there were no great corporations south of the Potomac; there were no combinations which were robbing the people. The trusts and monopolies and money changers were not there.

Mr. TILLMAN. And they are not there now.

Mr. GORMAN. And they are not there now, the Senator from South Carolina says. No. You were free from their control. You attempted to establish, and did establish, a government, and you conducted a great conflict such as the world has never seen conducted by a like number of people. But when you started your government the first financial act—the act of February 28, 1861—authorized bonds, coupon bonds bearing 8 per cent interest, running for five and twenty years, and you continued to issue bonds and stock, bearing interest, up to nearly $800,000,000. Your unfunded debt amounted to more than double the bonds, or $1,600,000,000 of treasury notes and other obligations which did not bear interest—not legal tenders, a friend in my rear tells me. No; they were not legal tenders, but they were convertible into bonds, and they were received for taxes and a great many other things, but not in payment of the export duty on cotton.

The idea I wish to present is that it is only by example and by history we can tell what is proper to be done. Here there were two great divisions of the American people; one representing exclusively agricultural interests, free from all of the great combinations which have been described here to-day, and the other, on this side of the Potomac, embracing within its confines practically all the great monopolies of which we hear so much; and yet those great men—for they were great men—supported both governments by issues of bonds. In so doing they followed only the teachings of history. When war begins no government is ever ready for it with ample supplies of money in its treasury, and, with the exception of Germany, which was prepared for war, there is no other instance in the last one hundred years where any government has been able to successfully prosecute a war without making a loan on bonds in the very beginning.

If that be true, why should we hesitate here? Why should we hesitate to vote for the issuance of bonds running ten and twenty years at 3 per cent interest? Every Senator is aware of the fact that, if we fail to make provision for that sort of a bond at low interest, and the crisis comes—as come, in my judgment, it will—when within thirty days, before you can get your tax bill in operation, the President of the United States and his Secretary of the Treasury, following the example of their predecessors, and as I believe they will be in duty bound—although there is doubt, and great doubt, as to the right to issue bonds for ordinary purposes—will be compelled to issue bonds running a longer time and bearing a higher rate of interest than those proposed to be issued under the terms of this bill.

Why, then, are we opposed to bonds, Mr. President? In the Senate we have met that question quite recently. At the close of Mr. Harrison's Administration, after the Presidential election of 1892 and before the inauguration of Mr. Cleveland, the condition of the Treasury was so threatening that bonds were asked for, and in this Chamber we placed upon an appropriation bill a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue 3 per cent bonds on like terms with those described in this bill; and more Democrats voted for the proposition than against it. Our friends the Populists and several of our Silver Republican friends voted against it. It was thrown out by the other House. It was thrown out, it was said, by secret instructions from the powers that were to be.

Following within eighteen months after that influence and that action, came the transaction of the sale of the bonds authorized under the act of 1875, which every Democrat in the Senate, and which nearly all Democrats everywhere, denounced. What brought that condition about? A deficiency in the revenue, and nothing else. What will bring about the necessity for bonds now? A deficiency in the revenue. In my judgment—I only speak for myself—Senators will be estopped from protesting against bonds. The President may sell $300,000,000 of bonds under the authorization of the act of 1875 if, in his judgment, it be necessary to maintain the honor, the dignity, and the glory of his country, and to secure the success of our arms.

I think the amendment of the minority of the committee is wise. The bonds are limited in amount and to a certain purpose, to be issued only after certain things have occurred. I think, with all due deference to the authors of that provision, even that is too restricted.

Mr. President, at this session of Congress the appropriations already made for all purposes of the Government, or which are pending and about to be made, including the war expenses and contracts authorized, including the sinking fund, amount to $923,682,797; excluding the sinking fund, to $872,682,797; and more is to be appropriated before the Senate adjourns. Senators who have spoken seem to be fearful of providing too much money. In my humble judgment you have not provided enough, even with the provision of the Finance Committee for bonds and certificates. I was not anxious that we should enter upon this contest. I had hoped we might adjust the matter without a conflict of arms in a manner honorable to the American people. But that has passed and gone.

We have entered upon a contest. When and where it will stop no man can tell. How much it is to cost no man can estimate. That it will cost during this year $400,000,000, $500,000,000 possibly, is, in my judgment, a moderate estimate. If it were to close and peace be declared within six months from this time, your expenditures would go on at a rate, compared with peace expenditures, that no man can measure to-day. The complications that may come from this war nobody knows. The cost of closing and adjusting all the questions that will arise can not be measured by tens of millions of dollars to-day, in my judgment. We have a fair Navy.

Who, after the occurrences of the last few months, expects this Government to suspend building war ships? They will be multiplied until the number reaches that point where we will be supplied, in the judgment of the people, with sufficient war ships to defend us from any act of aggression. Who can tell how far we are to go in looking to the development of the trade and commerce which is being strived for by all the nations of the earth? I do not expect to see any action which will prevent us from getting our full share of that trade and providing all the facilities for our war ships and ships engaged in commerce.

Mr. President, there is only one other feature of the bill to which I desire to allude, and that is the provision reported by the majority of the committee and so strongly advocated by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]—the issuance of $150,000,000 of greenbacks. I confess my amazement that that distinguished Senator and others should, in the year 1893, advocate and hold that the issuance of greenbacks, legal-tender notes of the Treasury, is now or ever was the Democratic doctrine or was ever maintained by either of the great parties, except for the great emergency of the war. I shall take the liberty of reading from one or two eminent Democrats who have spoken for the Democratic party in times past.

There was Judge Thurman. In 1874, on the floor of the Senate, when the question of issuing only a few millions more of greenbacks was under consideration, he made a speech. He had been charged with being in favor of inflation, the issuing of notes by the Government, because he had gone through the Ohio campaign of 1873 with his party, which there, under the control of Mr. Allen, advocated the greenback theory. Mr. Thurman's reply to this charge will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the session of 1874, page 2394, when he said:

Never did any man hear me utter one word in favor of inflation. Not one word, sir. I have spoken against a contraction of the currency that would bring about too speedily a resumption of specie payments; but never have I spoken in favor of that inflation of the currency which I think I see full well means that there never shall be any resumption at all. That is the difference. It is one thing to contract the currency with a view to a resumption of specie payments; it is another thing neither to contract nor enlarge it. But let resumption come naturally and as soon as the business and production of the country will bring it about; but it is a very different thing to inflate the currency never in all time to redeem it at all, and that is precisely what this inflation means. It means demonetizing gold and silver in perpetuity and substituting a currency of irredeemable paper based wholly and entirely upon Government credit and depending upon the opinions and the interests of members of Congress and their hopes of popularity, whether the volume of it shall be large or whether it shall be small. That is what this inflation means. Sir, I have never said anything in favor of that. I am too old-fashioned a Democrat for that. I have heard and preached too many hard-money lessons to advocate such a theory as that, and although there are many friends who differ with me in opinion, and from whom it pains me to differ, I can not give up the convictions of a lifetime, whether they be popular or unpopular, whether they please or whether they displease.

Now, following that, which was in 1874, came the Presidential convention of 1876. In the greenback campaign which was made in Ohio the Democratic party had lost. The Democratic party had been for hard money, for gold and silver, the money of the Constitution, and it wanted to right itself and relieve itself from those in Ohio who were carrying it toward the Populist idea. The Democrats wanted to recover it and bring the party back to its old moorings and its old doctrines, and they cast about the country for some man to lead them, and they found in Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, a man who could carry them, as they thought, to victory. They made a platform to suit his views upon the financial question, ignoring entirely the greenback theory and the "Ohio idea," as it was called, and placed him upon a sound-money platform of gold and silver. They did it with the knowledge of the fact that Mr. Tilden in 1875, right after this discussion and after the veto by the President of the greenback bill, had delivered a message to the New York legislature in which he said:

There is no doubt that the issue of legal tenders during the civil war hastened and greatly increased that inflation of prices which naturally resulted from the increased consumption and the waste resulting from military operations, and from the diminished production occasioned by so large a withdrawal of workers from their ordinary industries. It is the nature of credit to be voluntary; it is founded on confidence. Credit on compulsion is a solecism. Therefore a forced loan of capital from all existing private creditors can not but be costly.

It was made in this instance on a security which bore no interest, and interest on which could only be represented in discount from its par value. It gave to the lender an agreement to pay which, being instantly due on demand, started in its career a broken and dishonored promise. Every successive holder was left to conjecture when it would be redeemed by the issuer, how far it might be absorbed in the Treasury receipts, whether it could still be paid out to some private creditor, and at what loss it could be passed away in new purchases on a market advancing rapidly and irregularly. Everybody was advised that the Federal Government, unwisely distrusting the intelligence and patriotism of the people, shrank from exercising its borrowing power, supplemented by its taxing power, and instead of resorting at once to the whole capital of the country capable of being loaned, which forms a vast fund, perhaps thirty or forty times as large as the then existing currency, it chose to begin by debasing that comparatively insignificant part of circulating credits, creating fictitious prices for the commodities and services for which it was next to exchange its bonds, in an expenditure ten times as large as the whole amount of the legal tenders it ventured to put afloat.

No man could know how often or how much of legal tenders might be issued under possible exigencies of the future. It could not be wholly forgotten that such issues, made by our ancestors to sustain the victorious war for national independence, were never redeemed, while the public loans made for the same purposes were all paid. It was remembered that history affords other warning examples to the same effect. These elements of distrust were needlessly invoked. But the system stopped short of the logical completeness of the expedients of the French convention in 1793. While it compelled the existing private creditor, or anybody who should grant a new credit, to accept payment in legal tenders, it did not assume to regulate the prices of commodities. The seller, therefore, gradually learned to represent the depreciation of the currency in the price of the article he exchanged for it. As compared with gold, the currency, during all the last year of the war, was depreciated to between 40 and 50 cents on the dollar, touching at its lowest point 35 cents on the dollar.

Governments in times of public danger can not be expected always to adhere to the maxims of economical science; the few who would firmly trust to the wisest policy will often be overborne by the advocates of popular expedients, dictated by the general alarm. If the Federal Government had paid out Treasury notes, not made a legal tender, in its own transactions whenever it was convenient, and redeemed them by the proceeds of loans and taxes on their presentation at a central point of commerce, and meanwhile had borrowed at the market rates for its bonds, secured by ample sinking funds founded on taxation, and had supplemented such loans by all necessary taxes, the sacrifice would not have been half that required by the false system adopted, perhaps the cost of the war would not have been half what it became.

There, Senators, is the testimony of a man who was the greatest leader of his party in my time. It was his wisdom, his statesmanship, his courage, his control of men, his influence with capital that enabled us to have a reunited party in either Hall of Congress. Will you now, when his grave is still green, go back and repeat the folly of 1873, when there is no necessity whatever for such an experiment?

Mr. President, I dislike to go outside of my party for authorities against the issuing of greenbacks, but there is one, an honored member of this Chamber, one who now, as I understand, makes the majority of the committee who report in favor of the issuance of $150,000,000 of greenbacks, whom I will quote. I mean the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. I think I am right in saying that he makes up the majority of the committee on that question. If I am mistaken, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] will correct me. I have great admiration for the Senator from Nevada. I think upon the question of gold and silver and the use of those metals and upon financial questions there is no man within our time who has given greater study to these matters or who has rendered greater service to the country than he. He has a perfect right to change his opinion. We all do that, but he uttered truths upon this floor in 1874. No matter why he has changed his opinion since. No man has ever answered and no man, in my judgment, can answer the truths he then enunciated. I will let him speak for himself. In this debate, when it was proposed to increase the greenback circulation only $18,000,000, the Senator from Nevada, speaking of the action of Congress in 1862 and 1863, when they authorized the issue of greenbacks, legal-tender notes, said:

Ignoring the history of other nations, taking no warning from the wrecks of financial systems strewn along their pathway, the first thing we did was to make irredeemable paper a legal tender, and thereby almost immediately advance the price of everything 100 per cent. Having thus made everything we were compelled to buy double its former price, we then entered upon the negotiation of loans and a rigorous system of taxation to raise money with which to buy. This we should have done in the start, and what we could have done. But we first thoroughly demoralized the whole country and all its industries, we plundered the creditors and allowed the debtors to discharge their obligations by paying from 30 to 50 per cent less than they owed, and then we started to raise money for putting down the rebellion in the only way we should have done in the commencement. We resorted at the outset to measures condemned by financiers everywhere. To that which I would only have been willing to do at the last extremity. * * * A great war can not be carried on by pieces of paper payable at convenience and bearing no interest.

I commend that sentiment to every Senator on this floor. It is a truth that will last for all time.

This paper currency, instead of adding strength to the imperiled country, was a source of weakness. Its issuance was an impeachment of the patriotism of the nation and an underrating of the resources of the country. It was a cheat upon the people in teaching them the pernicious idea that in carrying on a great civil war economy and industry were not necessary; that production and destruction were convertible terms, and that the activity of the printing press in the production of paper money would amply compensate for the activity of armies in the destruction of wealth.

Said he, in reply to Mr. Morton, whether he regarded the greenback as a curse:

I do, most undoubtedly, and I further believe that it is the duty of men to face that question.

Those declarations were true when he uttered them, and they are true to-day. In my judgment, the results of the legislation of 1862 to 1865 will follow this measure if you enact it. You may impair the credit of the Government by this act. No Senator desires to do that, I know, but I appeal to all to stand by the uniform action of governments heretofore and supply the money in the only way in which history shows it can be supplied without jeopardy.

As I said at the outset, I am aware of the fact that there are differences on the tax provisions of this bill. They are matters of individual opinion, of honest judgment. Senators who differ with the view I present are as sincere as I am. They state what they believe to be right and proper and just upon this occasion. I do not believe, Mr. President, that there is the slightest desire on the part of anybody to gain any political advantage from the measures which we are considering, except that which naturally comes to the party in power because of the great responsibility and great expenditures and the great power placed in its hands. If I wanted to treat it alone from a political standpoint and gain advantage for my party, I would support the measure as I have indicated that I will support it.

I believe that if any advantage politically could come, it would come because there had been on my part a perfect sustenance of the Government when it was facing a foreign foe. The benefit would come because I have adhered to the doctrines of the party to which I belong. It would come because I have considered nothing but gold and silver the money of the Constitution. It would come because I have followed every great leader from Jackson down to Buchanan in maintaining the integrity of the Government and of its currency. Let us maintain the integrity of our circulating medium so that it can be used to pay our soldiers at home and the sailors and soldiers who are now fighting and bleeding and dying for us in a foreign land.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5463) granting an honorable discharge to Prentice Holmes was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 8480) providing for the sale of the surplus lands on the Pottawatomie and Kickapoo Indian reservations in Kansas, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAY OF EMPLOYEES.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 273) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of May, 1898, on the 28th day of said month, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be put upon its passage. The House intends to adjourn from this evening until Tuesday next, and these young men will be deprived of their regular pay unless the joint resolution is passed to-day.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the joint resolution be read at length.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is merely the ordinary joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of May, 1898, on the 28th day of said month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MALLORY in the chair). The Senator from West Virginia requests unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WAR REVENUE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the business may proceed. The revenue bill is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to amendment No. 177, reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON. Is not the pending question on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to the amendment of the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is under the impression that the Senator from Maryland did not formally propose his amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GORMAN. I did offer it in the course of my remarks, so as to have it printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that the Senator from Maryland proposes to strike out the amendment in great part and insert.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir; that is my amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. It is an amendment to the committee amendment, and I suppose it is in order.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Has it been printed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been printed.

Mr. WHITE. It has not been printed as yet. I presume there will be no desire to take a vote at this hour on that particular amendment. There ought to be some understanding as to when a vote is to be taken, and I suppose we shall take it to-morrow if Senators do not desire to discuss the matter any further.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope we can have an understanding that at an early hour to-morrow we shall vote on this series of amendments.

Mr. WHITE. The corporation tax series.

Mr. STEWART. I would prefer to vote on the bond question first, because my vote on this series of amendments may be very much changed by the result of the vote on that question.

Mr. ALLISON. What objection is there to voting on the bond amendment to-morrow?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I confess that I am a little doubtful now about making agreements as to a time to vote. Only yesterday or the day before I was almost willing to agree to have a day fixed for the final vote on the pending bill. Since that time some sweeping amendments have been brought in, having no connection in the world with the bill, proposing outside matter entirely foreign to the measure, and if an agreement had been reached we would have found ourselves with our hands tied with important amendments pending. For that reason I shall be a little slow about consenting to an agreement to vote at any particular time. There may be some one else who wants to discuss this amendment to-morrow morning or there may not be, and there may be amendments to be offered to-morrow. I think, as we have reached the hour of 5 o'clock, a motion to adjourn would probably be in order.

Mr. ALLISON. It is quite evident that we shall make very little more progress this evening with the bill. I merely wanted to test the sense of the Senate as to whether we were to go on with the bill or to adjourn or have an executive session at this time.

I move that when we adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to avoid, if possible, a call of the Senate soon after the Senate meets to-morrow. I yield now to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer an amendment to the pending revenue bill. I ask that it be read and printed and lie on the table. I will state that I offer the amendment because we seem to be going into subjects which appear to me to be outside the revenue bill.

The Secretary read the amendment as follows:

That the treaty concluded January 18, 1875, and proclaimed June 3, 1875, and the convention extending the duration of said treaty concluded December 6, 1884, between the United States and the King of the Hawaiian Islands, is hereby abrogated, repealed, and annulled, and duties collected on imports from said island the same as duties levied upon like products from other countries.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I also offer the following amendment to the revenue bill; which I ask may be read, printed, and laid upon the table.

The Secretary read as follows:

Every contract, combination in the form of a trust, or association or corporation whose effect is to restrict the quantity of production or increase the price of any article, or any conspiracy in restraint of trade, shall be deemed a trust within the provisions of this act.

There shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax of 5 per cent upon the value of all articles manufactured by a trust, as above described.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall make all the necessary rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this act, and the tax shall be collected by the Secretary of the Treasury, and any person connected with or in the employ of any trust, as herein described, who shall sell any article the property of said trust upon which the tax has not been paid shall be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 and be imprisoned for not less than one nor more than five years.

And all goods sold without the payment of tax as herein provided shall be seized and sold, and the proceeds of such sale turned into the Treasury of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield now to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. I am obliged to the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 271) donating a condemned cannon to the Thirty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver to the order of William B. Melish, executive director of the Thirty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, one dismounted condemned cannon, used in the late civil war, to be used for the purpose of furnishing memorial badges commemorative of the holding of such encampment at Cincinnati, Ohio. But no expense shall be caused to the United States through the delivery of the condemned cannon.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HARBOR AT SHEBOYGAN, WIS.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution (H. Res. 175) for the survey of the harbor at Sheboygan, Wis. It was passed by the House and reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce. It will lead to no debate.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to cause a survey to be made of the harbor at Sheboygan, Wis., to ascertain the best method and expense of preventing the injurious effects of the northeast seas, and to report as to the advisability of the project.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT SMITH AND WESTERN COAL RAILROAD.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 3177) to extend the time for the completion of the Fort Smith and Western Railroad.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. A bill in the same words and to the same effect has been passed by the House of Representatives. I desire to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill, so as to put the House bill upon its passage instead of the Senate bill. I ask the Secretary to read the House bill, in order that Senators may see that it is practically the same measure.

Mr. ALLISON. I take it the Senator from Arkansas desires to put the House bill on its passage.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. Why not take it up?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I propose to have it taken up in lieu of the Senate bill. The Senate bill has been favorably reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON. And the Committee on Indian Affairs should be discharged from the consideration of House bill 9477?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I make that request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the consideration of House bill 9477? The Chair hears no objection, and the committee is discharged. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9477) to amend section 8 of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1896, granting a right of way to the Fort Smith and Western Coal Railroad Company through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes. It proposes to amend the section so as to read:

SEC. 8. That said railway company shall build and complete its said railway on or before December 31, 1900, or this grant shall be forfeited; that said railway company shall construct and maintain, continually, all road and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway whenever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way, or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes that the Senator from Arkansas would like to have the Senate bill indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that Senate bill 3177 be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 3088) to amend "An act to provide the time and places for holding terms of the United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892, as amended by the amendatory act approved November 3, 1893;

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, May 28, 1898, at 11 o'clock a. m.

FRIDAY, May 27, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned yesterday it was dividing, and the yeas and nays had been ordered on the passage of a bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 30253) to amend the internal-revenue laws relating to distilled spirits, and for other purposes.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, does that take precedence of the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It is the regular order.

Mr. BRUMM. The regular order is the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; the regular order, after the previous question has been ordered, is to put the question to a vote. As many as are in favor of the passage of the bill will, when their names are called, say "aye," and those opposed "no." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 181, nays 65, answered "present" 21, not voting 138, as follows:

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I was not sufficiently advised to vote when my name was called, and consequently did not vote, as I had just come in. I wish to vote "nay."

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman can be recorded as "present," if he desires. The time for voting is when the gentleman's name is called, under our rules.

Mr. KELLEY. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that I called attention of the Chair to the matter before the pairs were announced, and the request was made to wait until the pairs were announced.

The SPEAKER. That does not make any difference. The rule requires a member to vote when his name is called. The only exception is where it seems his name may not have been called.

find I am paired with the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. DAVIDSON. I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Speaker, I was present when the roll was being called the second time, and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present, listening, and failed to hear it?

Mr. TONGUE. Yes, sir.

The name of Mr. TONGUE was called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have voted, and have since discovered that the gentleman with whom I am paired is not present. I do not know how he would vote, and I therefore withdraw my vote in view of that condition.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I was not present. I desire to vote "yea."

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to say that he was not present.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present." I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. WARD.

JOHN A. FAIRFAX.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business on the Private Calendar is the bill (H. R. 3093) for the relief of John A. Fairfax, of the District of Columbia. When this bill was last under consideration, the yeas and nays were ordered on a motion to lay it on the table, no quorum having developed.

Mr. RIXEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order for me to submit a request for unanimous consent? I would like to have read the findings of fact by the Court of Claims in this case. This bill was considered by the House two weeks ago. These findings of fact were not then read. It will not take over two minutes to read them; and I think it would be an act of justice to the claimant to have them read. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. PAYNE. Since this case was up I have, at the request of the claimant, read the findings of fact and all the papers in the case. When the bill was last under consideration, it was presented on the report of the committee, which contained every material fact. I think it is not worth while to take up time now with reading those findings. If they were read I should be obliged to ask five minutes to explain the matter further, and I object.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, this bill comes from the Committee on Claims. Now, the question I desire to submit, Mr. Speaker, is whether this day under the special rule is dedicated to bills reported by the Committee on Claims or to those reported by the Committee on War Claims? Last Friday, I believe, under the special rule, would have been the war-claims day, but by reason of the adjournment of the House from Thursday till the following Monday that committee was denied the opportunity of having its business considered.

Now, the point on which I wish the opinion of the Chair is whether when the day has been lost by reason of the adjournment of the House the committee which would have been entitled to that day is properly to be charged with the day as if it had been allowed to transact its business, or whether the spirit of that special rule is not that the two committees should have alternate days, so that if the House should not be in session on a particular Friday, the committee whose business would have come up on that day will not lose the day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has had occasion to examine the language of this special rule, and thinks it is such that each committee has a distinct day; and if any particular day is lost by reason of the House not being in session, it is lost to the committee whose day it would have been.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I had no desire to raise this question further than to obtain a construction by the Chair. I was not sure as to the proper construction of the rule.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one other parliamentary question in respect to this rule. The Chair will observe that it provides that on a particular Friday, and on each alternate Friday thereafter, bills reported by the Committee on War Claims shall have precedence over those reported from the Committee on Claims, and vice versa. Now, the very first claim, if I am not mistaken, which the gentleman from Virginia calls up under this rule is a bill on the Private Calendar, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Now, if one Friday is taken with bills from the Committee on War Claims and the next Friday is taken up with bills from the Committee on Claims, when is the Naval Committee to have a hearing for the bills which it has reported, under this rule?

Mr. BRUMM. My friend is in error.

The SPEAKER. So far as the action in the Committee of the Whole House is concerned, that would have to be determined in the committee; but so far as the House itself is concerned, the Chair thinks he has already ruled that that only refers to bills reported for consideration in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the House made this rule dedicating this Friday, we will say, to the Committee on Claims and next Friday to the Committee on War Claims. Now, here on the Private Calendar are bills reported by other committees, the first one, I believe, being one reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs. Now, if to-day is absolutely devoted to claims and next Friday to bills reported by the Committee on War Claims, when will the bills reported by the other committees of the House be considered—on what Friday?

The SPEAKER. They will take their turn, and the only effect of this rule is that when bills reported from the Committee on Claims or from the Committee on War Claims are reached on the Calendar, then they are to have preference as to each other, but not necessarily a preference over everything else on the Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Do I understand the Chair to mean to rule that a bill reported from the Naval Committee would, if reached on the day for claims, have its hearing?

The SPEAKER. It would have its hearing if it was reached.

Mr. BRUMM. I think you are in error as to the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not hear what the Chair said.

The SPEAKER. If it was reached, it would have its hearing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But how can it be reached if the day is dedicated—

The SPEAKER. Well, it is not dedicated. Nothing is said about dedicating it.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman is mistaken about the bill being from the Naval Committee. There is no such bill.

Mr. DALZELL. How could there be a private claim from the Naval Committee?

The SPEAKER. All that the rule says is:

All bills reported from the Committee on War Claims shall have precedence over bills reported from the Committee on Claims.

And further deponent saith not. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] is desirous to have this roll call vacated. Can that be done by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. To suspend the call?

Mr. BRUMM. To suspend the call.

Mr. RIXEY. I will state that I am perfectly willing to vacate the order, but I do not care anything about it. It will only save time; that is all.

Mr. BRUMM. It is evident what the result will be.

The SPEAKER. What is it proposed to do? It would come up again after the next thing was disposed of.

Mr. BRUMM. If the order for the roll call could be vacated, the decision of the Chair would be as to the result of the former division.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to ask unanimous consent that the bill do lie upon the table without taking the roll call?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes.

The SPEAKER. That would be in order.

Mr. BRUMM. Then I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the roll call be omitted and that the bill do lie upon the table. Is there objection?

Mr. RIXEY. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. RIXEY. I am willing that the bill should be recommitted—

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken on the motion to lay upon the table the bill (H. R. 3093) for the relief of John A. Fairfax, of the District of Columbia; and there were—yeas 104, nays 54, answered "present" 18, not voting 179; as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and instructed to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of May, 1898, on the 28th day of said month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OLMSTED, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] is willing that I should present House resolution No. 7.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I understand that Mr. LESTER of Georgia had been promised recognition, and I wish to withdraw my opposition to that.

JOHN C. COLEMAN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia presents the following bill for unanimous consent, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 9874) for the relief of John C. Coleman, of Emanuel County, Ga., as follows:

Whereas John C. Coleman, one of the sureties of Chesley Faircloth, on his bond as mail contractor, paid to the United States the sum of $34.58, on a judgment obtained against the said Faircloth and his sureties, which judgment should have been credited with the sum of $116.39, and which said judgment was duly assigned by the United States to the said John C. Coleman, and whereas the said Faircloth is dead, and his estate is insolvent: Therefore, Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the said John C. Coleman the said sum of $116.39, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I think there should be some explanation.

Mr. LESTER. I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. MINOR), as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9674) for relief of John C. Coleman, having given the same careful consideration, beg leave to report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The facts are as follows:

Chesley Faircloth was a contractor for carrying the mail on route No. 15286, Georgia. His sureties on his bond were John C. Coleman and White R. Smith. Faircloth incurred some penalties for remissness, which were charged up against him, and suit was brought by the United States against Faircloth, principal, and John C. Coleman and White R. Smith, his sureties, in the United States court at Savannah, and judgment was rendered against the principal and his sureties in March, 1896. Faircloth was insolvent, and the execution was levied upon the property of John C. Coleman, one of his sureties, in September, 1896, and he was forced to pay the judgment, the principal of which was $343.52, and the execution was transferred to Coleman by the United States, which he now holds.

Faircloth is dead. He left no estate, and there is no administration upon his estate.

When the judgment was paid by Coleman there was a credit of $116.39 to Faircloth on his contract, which should have been credited on the judgment, so the amount which Coleman should have paid was only $227.13. The Government has received from Coleman $116.39 more than it should have received, and should in equity and justice return to him said sum of $116.39.

OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1898.

SIR: Referring to our conversation of yesterday, relative to the balance of $116.39 due Chesley Faircloth, late contractor (now deceased), I have the honor to state that I am in receipt, by reference from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, of the letter surety John C. Coleman addressed to you, requesting the payment to him of said balance, for the reason that he, as surety, paid the judgment recovered by the United States in the United States district court for the southern district of Georgia.

The facts in the case are as follows:

The account of Chesley Faircloth, late contractor on route No. 15286, Georgia, was submitted to the Department of Justice in 1891 for suit against the principal and sureties, Messrs. Coleman and Smith, for the collection of a balance of $343.52, with the statement that there was due Mr. Faircloth a credit of $22.97, which was suspended on account of his indebtedness. This credit was subsequently increased to $116.39.

Mr. Coleman now desires that the said $116.39 be paid over to him for the reason above given.

In this connection I invite your attention to the opinion of the Comptroller of the Treasury, dated February 23, 1895 (1 Comp. Dec., 258-259, 261), in the matter of the "account of Pedro de Napoles, for refundment of tax illegally collected," to wit:

"When internal-revenue taxes, illegally or erroneously assessed against a distiller, are refunded, payment must be made to the principal against whom the assessment was levied, and not to a surety on his bond, although the latter may in fact have paid the assessment on behalf of his principal."

"Whether Mr. Shwarts (the surety) is equitably entitled to receive the amount refunded on the erroneous assessment made against Mr. De Napoles is a question for private settlement between them, and not one for the determination of and settlement by the Department."

"On an appeal by a surety on the bond of E. C. Benham, deceased, late postmaster at Hoquiam, Wash., from the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, to have refunded to him as such surety an amount paid by him on account of his principal, and which had been erroneously charged against the principal, the Comptroller, on April 24, 1894, held, following the established custom of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, that the accounts of the Government were with the postmaster, and that payments made by sureties on his behalf must be treated as payments by the principal, and that the amount refunded would have to be paid by a draft in favor of the personal representatives of the deceased postmaster."

In view of the above I inclose herewith a copy of blank form No. 638, "Application by widow or heir for balance due deceased contractor," with the recommendation that Mr. Coleman cause the same to be filled out and acknowledged by the personal representatives of Chesley Faircloth, designating one of their number to receive payment, accompanied by an affidavit of two disinterested persons as therein set forth.

If said form, properly filled out, should be returned to this office a draft will be drawn payable to the person designated to receive payment and forwarded in the care of Mr. Coleman, who will then be in a position to collect the money, provided, of course, the payee will indorse the draft.

Respectfully, yours,

HENRY A. CASTLE, Auditor.

HON. R. E. LESTER,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LESTER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SWORD OF HONOR TO COMMODORE GEORGE DEWEY.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate resolution 163, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to present a sword of honor to Commodore George Dewey, and to cause to be struck bronze medals commemorating the battle of Manila Bay, and to distribute such medals to the officers and men of the ships of the Asiatic Squadron of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized to present a sword of honor to Commodore George Dewey, and to cause to be struck bronze medals commemorating the battle of Manila Bay, and to distribute such medals to the officers and men of the ships of the Asiatic Squadron of the United States under command of Commodore George Dewey on May 1, 1898, and that to enable the Secretary to carry out this resolution the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HILBORN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

WALLABOUT CHANNEL, NEW YORK.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution No. 7, directing the Secretary of War to submit estimates for work upon Wallabout Channel, New York.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to submit estimates for work on Wallabout Channel, New York, with a view to secure a depth of 20 feet and a width of 300 feet at mean low water from its entrance to the timber causeway, in accordance with the plans heretofore submitted.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman if this has been reported by a committee?

Mr. BENNETT. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It does not carry an appropriation, it simply calls for submission of plans to the committee which have been already submitted to the Department.

Mr. DOCKERY. Neither does it carry the usual provision calling for the opinion of the Secretary of War as to the advisability of the improvement.

Mr. BENNETT. This comes from the Department, and the report reads:

Wallabout Channel, in the opinion of the engineer in charge who made the preliminary examination, is worthy of improvement by the Government, and is important not only for the increasing ferry accommodation between New York City and Brooklyn, but also for handling commerce at the wharves.

I am willing, however, to accept the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think it had better carry the usual provision.

Mr. BENNETT. I am willing to accept it.

Mr. CANNON. Where is Wallabout Channel?

Mr. BENNETT. It is a part of New York Harbor, and within the city of Brooklyn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the words "and that the Secretary of War be requested to submit his opinion as to the advisability of the proposed improvement."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE) there were—ayes 76, noes 1.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BENNETT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to yield to my colleague [Mr. JENKINS] on the Judiciary Committee, who has a matter of interest to every member of the House, and it will only take a moment.

Mr. HILBORN. Something about a salary? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. No; nothing about a salary.

Mr. PAYNE. How does the gentleman from New York control the time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to yield unconditionally.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then, Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls for the regular order; and the Clerk will report the next bill on the unfinished Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 4677. An act to provide for the employment of retired officers of the United States Army in time of war; and

S. 4678. An act providing for a Second Assistant Secretary of War.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 12,000 copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1897, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, 3,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate, 6,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

SENATE BILLS PASSED.

MRS. SARAH FRY.

As the next unfinished business, the bill (H. R. 8950) increasing the pension of Mrs. Sarah Fry was taken up, ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SENATE BILLS PASSED WITH AMENDMENTS.

Senate bills of the following titles on the Calendar of Unfinished Business were respectively taken up, the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House agreed to, and the bills as amended ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

- A bill (S. 1480) granting an increase of Lewis D. Baker;
- A bill (S. 2807) granting a pension to Benjamin L. Nolan;
- A bill (S. 1155) granting a pension to P. F. Castleman, of Oregon;
- A bill (S. 480) granting an increase of pension to William A. Beckford;
- A bill (S. 3442) granting an increase of pension to Andrew C. Mensch; and
- A bill (S. 158) granting a pension to Peter Daly.

CHARLES F. HOLLY.

The next unfinished business was the bill (S. 2320) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Holly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles F. Holly, late captain of Company H of the Second Colorado Cavalry, at the rate of $60 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House were read, as follows:

In line 7, after the word "Cavalry," insert the words "and pay him a pension."
In the same line, strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement. The bill just read provided, as passed by the Senate, for a pension of $50 a month. Mr. Holly is now about 80 years old. The report of the Senate committee shows that he is absolutely helpless, that he can not dress himself. The Senate report states also that he is now getting a pension of $20 a month. That is a mistake. He is now receiving $36 a month.

When the bill came over to this House, our committee, in pursuance of its rule, reported in favor of a pension of $30 a month—$6 less than the pension he is now receiving. Our committee was evidently misled by the statement in the Senate report that the pensioner is now receiving $20 a month.

Now let me read a little from the report to show what this case is:

Claimant was captain of Company H, Second Regiment Colorado Volunteer Infantry, and while in the service suffered from sunstroke. He was pensioned for headache, vertigo, and general nervous prostration, the result of sunstroke, and is now drawing $30 per month.

In fact, he is now receiving $36 a month.

Application for increase has been rejected on the ground that his present condition is due to old age rather than to the results of sunstroke.

Claimant is over 75 years of age.

I have his letter in my hand showing that he is about 80 years old. The report continues:

There are scores of affidavits on file (medical and otherwise) showing that he is totally disabled and requires the constant attendance of another person. The last official medical examination of claimant was made by the board of medical examiners at Pueblo, Colo., February 7, 1894, the report being as follows:

"He is a very feeble old man; shoulders much stooped; walks tottering; is very hard of hearing and has very little memory; body thin and poorly nourished; spines of cervical vertebrae very tender. He is unable to walk with eyes closed, and can not stand for an instant upon one foot with eyes closed. His skin is hyperaesthetic over the whole body. His shoulders, knees, and hips present crepitus on movement, and the movement of left hip is abridged to one-third normal. Right hip and knee present about one-half normal movement. Is unable to dress or undress himself without assistance, which he considers due to rheumatism, but which we believe to be due to the general neurasthenia resulting from sunstroke."

Now, the medical board find that this condition comes from a sunstroke. If the Department had found this, they would have allowed him $72 a month, but the Department physicians said they were unable to say that this came from a sunstroke, and were of the opinion that it came from his old age, or largely from that, he being now about 80 years old. But for that fact, I say, he would get $72 a month under the law. He is now getting $36. The Senate said he should have $50. We were satisfied with that.

But, as I say, when it came over here, the committee, seeing the report of the Senate showing that he was drawing only $30 a month, raised it, as they supposed, to $30, when, as a matter of fact, they lowered it $6. I was surprised when I got his letter asking us for Heaven's sake, if we could not do anything for him, not to take the little he had away from him, because, as he says, he is drawing $36 now, and the action of the House committee would give him $6 less than he is now drawing.

I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. TALBERT. Has he any property?

Mr. BELL. Oh, no.

Mr. TALBERT. He is absolutely dependent.

Mr. BELL. And has been for a long time.

Mr. LOVE. Has he a family?

Mr. BELL. Yes; he has a wife.

Mr. SHAFROTH. He was once the judge of the supreme court of Colorado Territory.

Mr. BELL. Ever since the war he has suffered from vertigo and is liable to fall anywhere, and he has dragged along and done nothing.

Mr. HUNTER. Had you not better dismiss your bill?

Mr. BELL. No; we expect to get the amendment voted down, and when the amendment is voted down we want to have the bill passed for $50 a month. The Senate passed the bill at that figure, and we, under a misapprehension, passed it at $30. By voting the amendment down and passing the bill as it passed the Senate we will give him $50. He was captain of Company H, Second Regiment Colorado Volunteers.

Mr. STEELE. Where did he serve? Where was his service?

Mr. BELL. I do not know about that. I suppose this report shows, but I do not know where his service was. He tells here, too, in his letter, but I do not know just where to look for it. Now, I move that we vote the amendment down and pass the bill. Will the gentleman from New York grant a little time to my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH]?

Mr. RAY of New York. When you get through I want to make a reply.

Mr. BELL. Well, I am through.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the attention of both sides of the House that the facts in regard to this case may be fully stated.

It seems as though an attempt has been made here by this pensioner and his friends to impose upon the Senate and upon the House of Representatives, and I think that it is time that transactions of this kind are ended. The Senate has already written a report in a case of this kind in which they condemn very earnestly the practice of coming to successive Congresses for repeated increases of pension for the same man by special act. If the Senate had known the facts of this case, it would not have reported the bill at all. If the Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House had known the facts of this case, it would not have reported the bill at all, unless adversely. We did not know the facts and were misled by erroneous statements.

The Senate bill came to the House with a report in which the Senate state that this man is now drawing a pension of $20 per month and that the Pension Bureau had denied him an increase upon certain grounds. The Fifty-third Congress, in view of the disabilities of this man, which then were as great as they are now, granted him by special act a pension of $36 per month, which he is now drawing by virtue of that special act. The Senate Committee on Pensions have adopted the following rule, to which they have adhered:

Where original pension or increase of pension has been allowed by special act, no proposition for additional pension will be entertained by this committee.

Still this man, concealing from the Senate and the Senate committee the fact which I have stated, that he draws $36 per month by special act, got from them a report increasing his pension to $50. He concealed the fact that a preceding Congress had passed upon the evidence and had fixed his pension at $36 per month. The bill came to the House. I sent for the papers and we investigated all of the affidavits filed, investigated all the evidence upon the merits, and the committee, after thorough discussion, fixed the rate at $30 per month, and said that it was all he was entitled to, giving him $10 per month more than the Pension Bureau did on the same evidence.

The Senate were induced to act in violation of their own rule. Not a word was said that the claimant is getting $36 per month. The matter came up here in the House at a Friday night session, and after discussion we approved the report of the committee, and the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole to this House at $30 per month. Then this man, drawing a pension of $36 per month, wrote on that he is getting $36 a month, and that he does not want to be cut down. I have investigated the facts of this case, and I want to read to you the record of this soldier who is drawing a pension of $36 per month.

His disabilities were not incurred in the service. He is an old man, but the United States Congress has never undertaken to pension old age by special legislation. What it does is to pension for disabilities incurred in the service, and when a man gets old, if he is very poor, we have sometimes granted such an increase as would keep him out of the poorhouse, give him a comfortable living. Now, where did this man serve? He enlisted and was mustered into the service. Here is where he served and how and when:

He is reported on the muster rolls of the company as follows: July and August, 1863, "Absent in Missouri on detached service by order of Governor John Evans, of Colorado Territory;" September and October, 1863, "Absent on detached service, Denver, Colo. T." The Second and Third Colorado Volunteer Infantry were consolidated and formed the Second Colorado Cavalry in October, 1863, and Captain Holly was assigned to Company H, Second Colorado Cavalry, November 23, 1863.

I insert here the House report on this bill, leaving out the report on the John P. Thomas bill and also the Senate report in this case, and in which it is stated that he draws only $20 per month:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill S. 2230 and the bill H. R. 1190, granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Holly, have carefully examined the same and all the evidence and respectfully report:

The Senate bill as amended by your committee proposes to increase from $20 to $30 per month the pension of Charles F. Holly, of Pueblo, Colo.

The military record of Charles F. Holly (annexed hereto) shows that he was appointed captain Company F, Third Colorado Infantry Volunteers, and commissioned as of July 16, 1863, and was honorably discharged on tender of resignation before the close of the war, September 16, 1864, making a total service of fourteen months.

During July and August, 1863, he was on recruiting service; during September and October, 1863, he was on detached service at Denver, Colo. T.; in November and December, 1863, he was absent on detached service; in January and February, 1864, he was absent on detached service at Kansas City, and also during March and April, same year, as member of a board of officers, but during April, 1864, was sick at Kansas City, Mo. During May and June was absent with leave, and during July and August, 1864, he was absent on detached service. He resigned in September. He did no duty in the field and was not with his command in any battle or campaign.

He has presented his case to the Bureau of Pensions and has been awarded a pension of $20 per month, the total of his rank.

He is now 77 years of age—an old man—and is pensioned for all the disability he has of service origin, viz, results of sunstroke. He is, of course, feeble, stooped from old age, and losing his eyesight. Such disabilities usually follow old age. They are not shown to be due to service. The soldier did not do duty or endure any hardship likely to produce them. There is no evidence showing the soldier to be poor or in necessitous circumstances. He writes a fair hand and has a good mind. There is nothing in the case to warrant an increase of this pension to $30 per month. An increase to $30 is giving all the facts will in any way warrant. The soldier is not helpless. His shoulders are stooped and he walks totteringly. But few men of his age are not in a like condition.

In the case of John P. Thomas (H. R. 164, Report No. 304), who served three years in the field and is now in absolute want and paralyzed and helpless from disease contracted in the service and a Southern prison, and is very poor, absolutely poverty stricken, the Senate cut down the amount given by the House to $30 per month.

That case is in every respect and in every aspect much more deserving than this. Special legislation in these cases must be consistent, and some degree of equality must be maintained. We must not be open to the charge of favoritism or partiality, but treat all alike who present substantially the same facts.

We annex hereto the reports on the two cases. In the Thomas case the soldier requires the constant aid and attendance of another person, while in the case of Holly, now being considered, not even frequent and periodical aid and attendance is required. In the Thomas case, long and hard service and exposure in the field and in a Southern prison have produced the disabilities, while in the case at bar old age is the chief producing cause.

The Senate bill is reported back with the recommendation that it pass when amended as follows:

In line 7, after the word "cavalry," insert the words "and pay him a pension."

In the same line strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

Military record of Charles F. Holly, captain Company F, Third Colorado Infantry, and Company H, Second Colorado Cavalry.

Charles F. Holly was mustered into service as captain Company F, Third Colorado Infantry Volunteers, to date July 16, 1863, with remarks:

"Appointed captain of Company F, Third Infantry, Colorado Volunteers, by Governor John Evans. Commissioned July 16, 1863. Was absent by order of Governor John Evans on recruiting service for his regiment at the time of the muster in of his company. This muster in is made to take effect from July 16, 1863, the date of his commission and muster in of his company."

He is reported on the muster rolls of the company as follows: July and August, 1863, "Absent in Missouri on detached service by order of Governor John Evans, of Colorado Territory;" September and October, 1863, "Absent on detached service, Denver, Colo. T." The Second and Third Colorado Volunteer Infantry were consolidated and formed the Second Colorado Cavalry in October, 1863, and Captain Holly was assigned to Company H, Second Colorado Cavalry, November 23, 1863.

The rolls of Company H, Second Colorado Cavalry, report him as follows: November and December, 1863, "Absent on detached service;" January and February, 1864, "Absent on detached service at Kansas City;" March and April, 1864, "Absent on detached service at Kansas City. Member of board of officers per Special Orders, No. 43, Headquarters D. C. M., February 25, 1864;" May and June, 1864, "Absent with leave from April 1, 1864, to April 15, 1864. Sick at Kansas City, Mo.;" and July and August, 1864, "Absent on detached service."

The medical records show him admitted to post hospital, Kansas City, Mo., June 23, 1864, with diarrhea.

He was honorably discharged the service on tender of resignation September 16, 1864.

Official statement furnished to Hon. John C. Bell, M. C.

By authority of the Secretary of War:

F. C. AINSWORTH.

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,

War Department, January 17, 1896.

[House of Representatives Report No. 123, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1908) granting a pension to Charles F. Holly, having considered the same, adopt the accompanying Senate report (No. 60) and recommend the passage of the bill as it passed the Senate.

[Senate Report No. 60, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1908) granting a pension to Charles F. Holly, have examined the same and report:

The claimant was captain of Company H, Second Regiment Colorado Volunteer Infantry, and while in the service suffered from sunstroke. He was pensioned for headache, vertigo, and general nervous prostration, the result of sunstroke, and is now drawing $30 per month. Application for increase has been rejected on the ground that his present condition is due to old age rather than to the results of sunstroke.

Claimant is over 75 years of age, and there are scores of affidavits on file (medical and otherwise) showing that he is totally disabled and requires the constant attendance of another person. The last official medical examination of claimant was made by the board of medical examiners at Pueblo, Colo., February 7, 1894, the report being as follows:

"He is a very feeble old man; shoulders much stooped; walks totteringly; is very hard of hearing and has very little memory; body thin and poorly nourished; spines of cervical vertebrae very tender. He is unable to walk with eyes closed, and can not stand for an instant upon one foot with eyes closed. His skin is hyperaesthetic over the whole body. His shoulders, knees, and hips present crepitus on movement, and the movement of left hip is abridged to one-third normal. Right hip and knee present about one-half normal movement. Is unable to dress or undress himself without assistance, which he considers due to rheumatism, but which we believe to be due to the general neurasthenia resulting from sunstroke."

In addition to this the board found the heart sounds nervous and irritable, and also that claimant was suffering from a large oblique inguinal hernia.

This case presents an interesting study of the difference of opinion between medical boards who personally examine claimants and that of the medical officers of the Pension Bureau. Had the opinion of the examining board in this case been accepted the soldier's pension would have been increased to $72 per month, but as their opinion was overruled no increase was allowed.

Your committee call attention to the fact that the pension was granted for headache, vertigo, and general nervous prostration, resulting from sunstroke, and also to the further fact that the present condition of soldier is typical of an advanced case of neurasthenia (nervous prostration). There are several medical affidavits on file in the case showing this fact, in addition to the opinion of the three members of the medical board who last examined him. Under these circumstances it seems more than probable that the disability contracted in the service has had much to do with the existing condition. Recognizing, however, that at best it is a matter of opinion, your committee do not feel justified in recommending the full pension of $72 per month, but recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "seventy-two," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

Up to November, 1863, he had not been within a hundred miles of a hostile force. He had not heard the sound of a hostile gun. He had a commission as captain, but was on detached service in the cities all the time, looking up recruits. The rolls of Company H, Second Colorado Cavalry, report him as follows—this is after the regiments had been consolidated:

November and December, 1863 "Absent on detached service;" January and February, 1864, "Absent on detached service at Kansas City;" March and April, 1864, "Absent on detached service at Kansas City. Member of board of officers per Special Orders, No. 43, Headquarters D. C. M., February 25, 1864;" May and June, 1864, "Absent with leave from April 1, 1864, to April 15, 1864. Sick at Kansas City, Mo.;" and July and August, 1864, "Absent on detached service."

From the time he entered the service until the day he left it, so far as the records show, he never saw a foe; he never heard the sound of a hostile gun. He claimed afterwards that in Kansas City, when serving on detached duty in connection with the commissary department, I think it was, he suffered sunstroke. There is no evidence of it; only his own statement. He was only sick for about thirty days all told. He had his pay as a captain, and if he had served as valiantly in the Army as he has served since in trying to get special pension bills through, giving him pensions to which he is not entitled under the laws of his country, he would have done a great deal toward putting down the rebellion.

But he did no service except at Kansas City and at Denver, on recruiting duty, and at other places and in connection with the commissary department or some detached duty where fighting was not required. I say that the special bill granted two years ago by the Senate and this House, after a full consideration of all this evidence, gives him all he was entitled to and more. Our committee examined the evidence, and we fixed the rate $10 in excess of what the Bureau of Pensions did, and we happened to fix it $6 lower than the last Congress did. Now, if the consideration of this bill is insisted upon, I shall move that it lie on the table, for this man is getting more pension now than he is entitled to, and he is getting it under a special act of Congress that was only passed two years ago.

These are the facts of the case, and there is not a thing in or about the case that will warrant any such pension as was smuggled through the Senate in violation of its own rules, under the statement that he was drawing only $20 per month when in fact he gets $36 by special act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, upon this bill and the amendments I call for a vote, and ask for the previous question.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire a minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] calls for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken on the amendment reducing the amount from $50 to $30; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAY of New York) there were—ayes 44, noes 4.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is a second amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, after the word "Cavalry," insert the words "and pay him a pension."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. BELL. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

LUCIA A. HYNES.

The next business on the Calendar of Unfinished Business was the bill (S. 507) restoring to the pension roll the name of Lucia A. Hynes.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

RICHARD T. SELTZER.

The next business on the Calendar of Unfinished Business was the bill (S. 1424) granting a pension to Richard T. Seltzer.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was reported.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit some few remarks to the House on pension subjects, not strictly, however, upon this present bill. I would like to ask unanimous consent to proceed, not to exceed fifteen minutes.

Mr. RAY of New York. I trust the gentleman will wait until we get these bills disposed of.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, what is the request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to address the House for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. On what?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On a subject cognate to the bill.

Mr. TONGUE. On pension subjects.

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in opposition to this bill. I will try not to detain the House very long on this subject.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States can display, and on many great occasions have displayed, magnificent generosity. In providing for the soldiers of the civil war their munificence has not been circumscribed or controlled by the terms of any contract, express or implied. When the war closed, the pay rolls signed, and the bounties received, the Government had fulfilled the technical requirements of its contract with the soldiers.

But where the contract ended, gratitude and generosity began. These have been extended not only to those disabled in their country's defense, but to many who received no injuries, participated in no battles, and to widows and children born long after the war. Though a third of a century has elapsed since the last battle was fought, we are paying in pensions full pay for a million soldiers in the field. The pension roll for eight months would build the Nicaragua Canal. In addition to that we are furnishing homes for the homeless veterans, and paying the several States to do likewise. History contains no record of a nation's generosity to its defenders comparable to that of the American people to the veterans of the civil war. This is not all.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. GREENE. The gentleman is not speaking to the bill under consideration.

Mr. TONGUE. I am speaking to the bill. It is a bill to grant pension, and I am trying to show that we have already paid enough.

Mr. GREENE. The gentleman is not speaking to the bill before the House at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has hardly proceeded far enough to disclose whether he is talking on the bill or not.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Speaker, the other side of the House has generally succeeded in refusing unanimous consent to any request that I have made.

Mr. GREENE. Print it in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. Go on; you have an hour.

Mr. TONGUE. A short time ago, Mr. Speaker, we appropriated without dissent, almost without deliberation, $50,000,000 to be employed in procuring the liberty of a people alien in race and language.

We have called a sudden halt in our own industrial developments, deferred the improvement of our rivers and harbors, the construction of our public buildings, the completion of public improvements, the construction of the Nicaragua Canal. We are about to increase our bonded indebtedness, impose more taxes upon our own people, increase our pension roll, and offer up the flower of American manhood, some to perish by the sword, more by pestilence and disease in a foreign land, in order that a million and a half of people may be free and may own and govern the small island upon which they live, and in order to maintain the supremacy of the Republic and the honor of our flag.

Just now, when the people of the United States are about to divert their attention from business questions and commercial enterprises to contemplate heroic deeds, unselfish and patriotic devotion to flag and country, the time seems opportune to call attention to deeds of valor, patriotic services, and unselfish sacrifices in the interest of country and humanity rendered by our own citizens half a century ago, but whose worth has too long been ignored and whose service has been too long unrewarded.

All this is magnificent. But among these outbursts of generous impulses ought not the American people, ought not this House, to employ a few moments in dealing out justice, too long delayed, to some of the bravest of our own people before the sod covers their graves? If we want patriotic and heroic devotion to flag and country in the future, is it well to ignore these qualities in the past?

Mr. Chairman, more than fifty years ago the United States possessed by good title a rich and magnificent territory in the Northwest, many times larger than Cuba, much richer in resources, capable of maintaining a much larger population, and far more needful for our protection and prosperity, but which this Government made no effort to occupy.

A large part of it was in dispute and claimed by Great Britain. While that nation, ever alert to acquire new territory, was making haste to unite actual occupancy with color of title, navigating our rivers with her ships and covering the land with her traders and trappers, this Government, derelict in duty, raised not a single hand, sent not one soldier or officer to defend its rights, assert its dominion, or represent its authority. That it was not forever lost to the United States is not due to the vigilance of the Federal Government. Where this Government failed in duty a band of pioneer men and women, as brave and patriotic and big-hearted as ever faced danger or suffered sacrifice, took up the work, and saved as an integral part of this Government the future home of 50,000,000 of people.

Over 3,000 miles of arid plains and unbroken, rock-ribbed mountains, chasing the mirage by day, defending themselves from savage beasts and more savage men by night, they wended their way westward. Along their pathway, in many a spot, a fresh-turned sod, wet with women's tears, covered the victim of savage vengeance. Weary and worn with travel, their ranks thinned from repeated conflicts, they planted the Stars and Stripes, defended by their valor and baptized by their blood, on the shores of the Pacific, there to receive the first kiss of the western breeze and to wave the last good night to the setting sun. After this brave people had added American occupation to American title, and had planted its banner on the battlements of the Pacific, the Government made no effort to defend flag or people.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order. I understand the gentleman is not speaking to the bill before the House. As that rule has been invoked against gentlemen on this side of the House and enforced, I make the point of order that he should confine his remarks to the bill before the House.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Oregon is discussing a pension bill and the propriety of enacting it; and as I understand his remarks up to this time, he is addressing such arguments as seem to him proper to the extent of the bounties or gratuities of this Government, as the case may be, toward others, which may affect the purpose and object of this bill. [Laughter.] The gentleman laughs.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not laugh.

Mr. CANNON. A man who has the floor for an hour must be allowed a little latitude in producing such argument for the consideration of the House as seems to him apt and proper. It may not be a proper one to the gentleman from Tennessee, and yet entirely proper to the gentleman entitled to the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois, I understand the gentleman from Oregon does not believe his remarks are in order, for he asked unanimous consent to make them out of order, conceding that they were out of order; and when unanimous consent was refused he insisted on reading to the House his remarks which he failed to get unanimous consent to deliver out of order.

Now, I call him to order, because that rule has been rigidly enforced by gentlemen occupying the chair during the last three, four, five, or six weeks of this Congress against gentlemen on this side. Ordinarily I do not object to speeches out of order; but inasmuch as that rule has been invoked and applied with rigid force against gentlemen on this side, I now invoke and make the point of order that the gentleman, on a private pension bill pending in the House of Representatives, not in the Committee of the Whole House, can not depart from the rule and discuss general politics. Now, I appeal to the Chair to enforce the rule which has been rigidly enforced against this side of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Just a word in reply. The gentleman from Oregon is not talking about free trade, free silver, or the Chicago platform.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That would be just as much in order as what he is speaking about.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Nor anything of that kind. The gentleman, as I gather it, is talking about a bill which proposes to pension a soldier of the late war; and he has a right, in making his speech, to bring in anything that will furnish the House—

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is what we have always contended—

Mr. CANNON (continuing). With statements as to the proper extent and the propriety of enacting bills—

Mr. RICHARDSON (continuing). And it has been held the other way by the Chair.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). For others that are not on the pension roll.

I am not making his speech for him, but I have been listening to his speech, and it seems to me it is strictly in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Which side of the pending question is the gentleman from Oregon speaking upon?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Oregon has a full hour to talk upon the subject of pensions and the policy of passing this bill, and it is not in the mouth of the gentleman from Tennessee to say what the nature of his arguments shall be, or as to whether they are sound or unsound.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order in the most respectful way, and I appeal to the Chair to enforce the same rule which has been enforced heretofore—I make no complaint about it—that while a private pension bill is pending here the gentleman can not make a political speech. It is not upon the pending bill; it is a political harangue.

Mr. CANNON. The Chair can not make a speech for a member entitled to the floor. As long as that member talks to the subject before the House he must be the judge of what he will say and what argument he will address to the House to affect the merits of the bill and the policy touching the passage of the bill or anything else that seems to him proper.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will ask my friend from Illinois again, why did the gentleman from Oregon concede that his remarks were out of order by asking unanimous consent to make his speech?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman can not have a point of order decided upon an estoppel.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Oregon conceded that it was not a speech upon the pending question by asking unanimous consent, which was refused. That is better authority than the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. What the gentleman from Oregon thought was in order or was not in order does not affect the question. What the gentleman from Tennessee thinks about it does not make it in order or out of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Oregon confessed that he was not in order, and I think he was right about it.

Mr. CANNON. That confession I did not hear.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I heard it.

Mr. CANNON. I did not understand him to have conceded that his speech was out of order; but whether he did or not, it is what the gentleman says that determines whether he is in order touching the matter before the House. If the gentleman from Tennessee must put words into the mouth of the gentleman from Oregon before the gentleman from Oregon shall be in order, then the gentleman from Tennessee furnishes the brains and the tongue and the words that the gentleman from Oregon must repeat before he will be in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman from Oregon, inasmuch as he has a prepared speech and is reading it, if he prepared it as a discussion upon the pending bill? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. That does not determine the question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not asking the gentleman from Illinois. I am asking the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Oregon has been called to order. The gentleman from Oregon, except by consent of the House, can not speak.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, he can; he can discuss the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Tennessee is seeking to violate another rule of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. TONGUE. I am ready to answer the question of the gentleman from Tennessee. I want to say that these remarks will not occupy over fifteen minutes. They have been prepared on the pension question. In answer to the question asked whether it was upon this pension bill, I want to say it is in opposition to the bill. I want to be able to say to this House that while it is voting every Friday, giving pensions to men who endured no hardship, who fought no battles, who received no wounds, for widows who married long after the war, I want to call attention to the fact that there are in Oregon men who fought for this country, who were in actual conflict fifty years ago, who have received no pension.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman thought his remarks were in order, why did he ask unanimous consent to make them?

Mr. TONGUE. If the gentleman wants to know my thought, I expected that somebody on the other side would object to anything I might say that they thought might aid me. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOCKERY. At the approaching election in Oregon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then the gentleman was seeking an advantage for himself, and not for the good of the country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The question before the House is the bill S. 1424, an act granting a pension to Richard P. Seltzer. There is no question before the House as to the expediency or in expediency of general pension legislation. The remarks of the gentleman from Oregon have related so far simply to pension legislation in general, and the Chair feels constrained, in construing the rule as it has been construed this session, to hold that the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of taking the sense of the House on this question (cries of "Regular order!"), I desire to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but I happen to have the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You have not, I guess.

Mr. CANNON. I guess I have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] has the floor.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been decided many times, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will recollect, that when a member has taken an appeal his recognition ceases until he is recognized again. The gentleman from Tennessee has made a motion to lay the appeal on the table. That is the question now before the House, and is not subject to debate.

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 87, noes 11. Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to count a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make the point that there is no quorum present?

Mr. CANNON. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (having counted the House). There are 142 members present—not a quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules of the House, no quorum having voted, the yeas and nays are considered as ordered and a call of the House is in progress. The doors will be closed, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is the question upon which we are to vote the question of sustaining the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. BARTLETT. As I understand, the pending motion is to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is correct.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And an affirmative vote sustains the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois appealed from the decision of the Chair; and the gentleman from Tennessee moved to lay the appeal on the table. The question is, Shall the appeal be laid on the table?

Mr. BERRY. Before the roll is called, I think we can compromise this matter. If the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. TONGUE] is permitted to print his remarks in the RECORD he will be satisfied; and then we can go on with business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But there is no quorum present. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 9, answered "present" 87, not voting 175; as follows:

Mr. MUDD with Mr. VANDIVER.

Mr. BROMWELL with Mr. COONEY.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. LEWIS of Georgia.

Mr. HAWLEY with Mr. BULL.

Mr. HARMER with Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I have a general pair with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not know how he would vote if present. I therefore withdraw my vote, and wish to be recorded as "present."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My colleague from Mississippi, Mr. HENRY, has been called from the Chamber this evening on important business.

Mr. GAINES. My colleague, Mr. SIMS, was unexpectedly called from the Hall a few moments ago. I am sure that if present he would vote "aye."

The Clerk having completed the call of the roll, and a quorum not having then appeared, the following occurred:

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order now to ask unanimous consent to take the usual recess until 8 o'clock this evening?

The SPEAKER. It would not, no quorum having yet appeared. The Clerk will call the names of members who present themselves.

Various members presented themselves, their names were called, and they voted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER. The gentlemen will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Formerly in the absence of a quorum a resolution had to be passed requiring the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in absentees. I desire to know if, under the rule of the present House, the Sergeant-at-Arms is required to bring in absentees in a case like the one now pending?

The SPEAKER. He is.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Without a resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he is, under the rule.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think that is the proper construction of the rule; but inasmuch as it is a new rule which has never been passed upon, I wanted a ruling of the Chair to settle the question. As I understand it, it is the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in absent members.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall forthwith proceed to bring in absent members. We have never had occasion to wait before—

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is the reason I ask. I wanted to know if the Sergeant-at-Arms was discharging his duty.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes he is.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I voted in the affirmative. I desire to withdraw my vote and be marked as present.

Various other members having appeared and voted,

The SPEAKER announced the result—yeas 104, nays 9, present 36.

Accordingly, the appeal was laid on the table.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill, the bill was passed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. JENKINS, for the remainder of this day, on account of important business.

To Mr. FARIS, for ten days, on account of important business.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10121) to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 9, 10, and 11.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 14, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of said amendment strike out the word "sixth" and insert in lieu thereof the word "third;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment, as a new paragraph, the following:

"And be it further enacted, That during the existing war the Bureau of Ordnance of the War Department is authorized to purchase, without advertisement, such ordnance and ordnance stores as are needed for immediate use, and when such ordnance and ordnance stores are to be manufactured then to make contracts, without advertisement, for such stores to be delivered as rapidly as manufactured."

JOHN A. T. HULL,
M. GRIFFIN,
JAS. HAY,

Managers on the part of the House.

JOS. R. HAWLEY,
REDFIELD PROCTOR,
F. M. COCKRELL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the managers on the part of the House was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill H. R. 10121 submit the following written statement in explanation of the conference report herewith submitted:

Senate amendments numbered 2, 9, 10, and 11, from which the Senate recedes, are as follows:

No. 2: Proposed to strike out the words "in the discretion of the Secretary of War," as it appears in the print of the bill as it passed the House.

No. 9: Proposed to suspend section No. 3709 so far as the same relates to the bureaus of the War Department and all branches of the Army. This section requires that in all purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the Departments of the Government, except for personal services, proposals therefor shall be previously advertised a sufficient time. The object of the amendment is accomplished by a subsequent amendment to the bill.

No. 10 proposed to suspend all that portion of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," which requires purchases of amounts less than $300 made without advertising to be immediately reported to the Secretary of War.

No. 11 provides that so much of the act approved March 15, 1896, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes," as provides that all employees for the Record and Pension Office of the War Department shall be exclusively engaged in the work of that office.

That the Senate also agrees to the House amendment to Senate amendment numbered 12.

Senate amendments numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, from its disagreement to which the House recedes, are merely verbal corrections.

Senate amendment numbered 3, from its disagreement to which the House also recedes, strikes out the words "with Spain" where they occur in line 5, House print of the bill.

Senate amendment numbered 14, from its disagreement to which the House recedes, is merely an amendment to the title, making it apply to the War Department generally in lieu of confining it to the Quartermaster's Department as in the original bill.

Senate amendment numbered 13, from its disagreement to which the House recedes, with an amendment, reads as follows: "Sixth. So much of the act approved March 15, 1896, entitled, 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899,' under the heading 'Ordnance Department' as provides that no more than $65,000 of the money appropriated for the Ordnance Department in all its branches shall be applied to the payment of civilian clerks in said department." The amendment consists merely in changing the number of the paragraph from "sixth" to "third."

Senate amendment numbered 12, from its disagreement to which the House recedes and agrees to the same with an amendment, is as follows: "And be it further enacted, That during the existing war materials required by the War Department may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be purchased abroad and shall be admitted free of duty."

The amendment thereto to which the House has agreed consists in adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That during the existing war the Bureau of Ordnance of the War Department is authorized to purchase without advertisement such ordnance and ordnance stores as are needed for immediate use, and when such ordnance and ordnance stores are to be manufactured then to make contracts, without advertisement for such stores to be delivered as rapidly as manufactured."

J. A. T. HULL,
M. GRIFFIN,
JAMES HAY,

Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

CERTAIN LANDS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 8739) to authorize the resurveying of certain lands in Cheyenne County, in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears from the report of the United States Topographic Survey, and also from a survey made by the county surveyor of Cheyenne County, in the State of Nebraska, that errors exist in the Government survey in the northern part of said Cheyenne County, and that according to said surveys a number of townships in said northern part of said Cheyenne County, and particularly in townships 22, 23, and the north half of township 21 north, of range 47 west, of the sixth principal meridian, are only 5 miles wide from east to west; and

Whereas the maps and plats on file show said sections to be full, and that on account of such errors great confusion and much litigation exist and will ensue: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made a survey of the lands in said northern half of Cheyenne County, in the State of Nebraska, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to correct the errors existing in said original survey; and all rules and regulations of the Interior Department requiring petitions from all settlers on said lands asking for a resurvey and agreement to abide by the result of the survey, so far as these lands are concerned, are hereby abrogated: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair the present bona fide claim of any actual occupant of any of said lands so occupied.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on the Public Lands were read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made a survey of the following lands in Cheyenne County, in the State of Nebraska: Townships 21, 22, and 23 north, range 47 west, principal meridian, and so much of the lands adjacent thereto as may be necessary to correct the errors existing in the original survey of said lands. And all rules and regulations of the Interior Department requiring petitions from all settlers on said lands asking for a resurvey and an agreement to abide by the result of the survey, so far as these lands are concerned, are hereby abrogated: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair the present bona fide claim of any actual occupant of any of said lands so occupied to the amount of land to which, under the law, he is entitled: And provided further, That said resurvey shall in no manner affect the rights of bona fide occupants of any of said lands to the land so occupied to the amount which said occupants are entitled to receive from the Government."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INDIAN RIVER, FLORIDA.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill to amend an act "Making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1896.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit it, but he thinks that when the hour of 5 o'clock arrives—

Mr. HOOKER. Then it would go over as unfinished business, would it not?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER (during the reading). The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House is, by its rules, in recess until 8 o'clock this evening, when the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CONNOLLY, will please act as Speaker pro tempore.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., resumed its session, with Mr. CONNOLLY in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session under the special rule, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, before we go into Committee of the Whole, I ask unanimous consent that to-night all bills for the removal of charges of desertion be passed over, except in cases where the member introducing the bill is present to explain its merits and advocate it.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that we have got a whole lot of unfinished business, which is the first thing in order to-night before we go into that.

Mr. TALBERT. I suggest to the gentleman that that will not interfere with this request.

Mr. RAY of New York. No; that is what we will do.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Let us settle this first.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] asks that all bills for the removal of political disabilities and charges of desertion be passed over, except in cases where the member offering the bill is present to explain its merits. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know whether the rule adopted at the two preceding meetings of the House on Friday night, with reference to the manner in which bills shall be called up, is still in existence? I do not remember whether it was permanently adopted or only just for the session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That rule was for that special session.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the same rule in reference to the way in which bills are to be called up be continued to-night. Let them be called up, and if the member introducing the bill is present, let it be considered, and if not, let it be passed over.

Mr. RAY of New York. I hope the gentleman will not make that request.

Mr. BARTLETT. It has been done on a number of other occasions here without objection.

Mr. RAY of New York. I understand it has been done heretofore in order to get along, to avoid the point of no quorum; but it is not fair to the members of this House under existing conditions. There are a great many who have been called away to-day. We have adjourned over until after Memorial Day. They are called home on business, or to see their families; and I told several members I did not think this method of procedure would be insisted on this evening. It simply operates to bring the Senate bills to the front. It deprives members of their rights. Many are gone to observe Memorial Day, to make addresses; both Democrats and Republicans are gone for this patriotic purpose.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am willing to except the Senate bills, unless the members are here and present them.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is not the point. It simply operates to put the Senate bills ahead of those of members of the House; and those members are not here; they can not be here, and it throws their bills to the rear. They do not expect to be here; they do not understand it, and they can not be here, many of them.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to embarrass anybody, but I think those members of the House who have business here and who come Friday night after Friday night to look after it, and wait and wait and wait for it and assist to carry on the business of the House, deserve some consideration, more consideration than those who do not even come here to make a quorum or do anything toward transacting the business of the House. I make the request. Of course the gentleman from New York can object to it if he desires to do so.

I think those of us who are here to attend to the consideration of private business are more entitled to consideration than those who do not come here for the purpose of transacting the business of the House. If any member is absent by reason of sickness or the sickness of any member of his family, and it is stated, or if any member is absent on public duty, such as the gentleman from Pennsylvania was the other day, I think his bill ought to be considered. I do not think those of us who come here to transact business ought to be called upon to attend to business of that kind in their absence, and I think those who have bills here and are looking after them ought to have them considered.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do hope, the whole afternoon having been wasted, that we may go on and attend to these bills. We have a great deal of unfinished business, and I hope it will be taken up and completed, and then we will go to the other Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BARTLETT. I wish to say, about the whole evening being wasted, I do not think myself or gentlemen on this side were the cause of its being wasted.

Mr. RAY of New York. I am not saying that.

Mr. BARTLETT. The afternoon was wasted because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] made the point of no quorum, and an effort was made to waste the time of the House in discussing matters not before the House, and to consume time that had been allotted under the rule for the Friday session to the transaction of public business, when there were upon the Private Calendar some forty or fifty pension bills, and the evening was wasted because one gentleman upon that side, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], made the point of no quorum. That is how it was wasted, and we are not responsible for it being wasted. I again repeat the request, that the same rule adopted here for the consideration of business ought again to be adopted.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Objection is made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. BARTLETT. All right, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I would like, before we go into Committee of the Whole, for the House to turn to file 676.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order has been called for.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask for the regular order, which is the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky has demanded the regular order, which is the unfinished business.

DANIEL G. GEORGE.

The first business on the Calendar of Unfinished Business was the bill (S. 506) granting an increase of pension to Daniel G. George.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The question was taken on ordering the bill as amended to be read a third time; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SIMS. Division. I have no object in the world except to see how many members come here to attend to business. It will not take more than a moment to count this crowd.

Mr. RAY of New York. Those present on both sides are good men and capable of doing business.

Mr. SIMS. Let the country see how many are here.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 29, noes 0.

Mr. SIMS. I am not going to make the point of no quorum; but 29 members of this House here to vote money out of the Treasury is a remarkable spectacle for this country to have to witness.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH PORTER.

The next bill on the Calendar of Unfinished Business was the bill (S. 1477) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Porter.

The bill was read.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent of the House to extend the remarks I had intended to make this afternoon. I want to say they would not have occupied more than five minutes, and not one word in reference to political questions or disputed questions was contained in the remarks. They pertain purely to the question of giving pensions to the survivors of Indian wars located in the different States, some of them in the South, but principally in the West. There is no politics in it at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SENATE BILLS PASSED.

In the following Senate bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole, the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were severally agreed to, the bills as amended ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. 1473) granting a pension to Oscar A. Palmer;

A bill (S. 853) granting an increase of pension to George L. Durbin;

A bill (S. 2751) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Johnson;

A bill (S. 1075) granting an increase of pension to Edward Stanley;

A bill (S. 769) to increase the pension of Clark W. Harrington; and

A bill (S. 486) granting a pension to Mary M. Macauley, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Daniel Macauley, United States Volunteers.

CASSIUS M. CLAY, SR.

The next bill on the Calendar of Unfinished Business was the bill (S. 1119) granting a pension to Cassius M. Clay, sr., a citizen of Kentucky and a major-general in the Army of the United States in the war of the rebellion.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Cassius M. Clay, sr., a major-general in the volunteer service of the United States in the war of the rebellion, and pay him a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of any pension he may now receive on account of such service.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 7, after the word "pension," insert the words "at the rate."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act granting a pension to Cassius M. Clay, sr."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out the word "fifty" and insert "twenty-five." My reason for that is this: General Clay has a splendid estate in Kentucky, sufficient to support him; an estate valued, as I understand, or assessed at $18,000 or $20,000. He has no one to support but himself, and, as was very justly said by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions this afternoon, that committee did not propose to pension anyone on account of age alone, but on account of disabilities and dependent circumstances.

I understand, from the reading of the report last Friday night, that General Clay incurred no disability in the service, was never wounded, and never rendered much service anyway. I submit that $25 ought to be enough, notwithstanding his extreme age, and I hope the House will sustain this motion to amend the bill so that it will carry $25 a month instead of $50 a month.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not want any misapprehension on the part of the gentleman from South Carolina. General Clay served first through the Mexican war. He then entered the war of the rebellion and served in a lower capacity; but after that was appointed a major-general of volunteers, and served until some time in April, 1863, I think it was, when he was appointed minister to Russia.

Now, I think the gentleman from South Carolina has been a little extravagant in his description of General Clay's property in Kentucky. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLARKE] tells me that he knows General Clay and knows about his property, and while he has quite a large tract of land, he has no property beside that, and is old and has no one to work it. And notwithstanding he has this estate, it produces no income to him. That is all I know about it. The land is not very valuable or productive.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not want, Mr. Speaker, to do anybody an injustice. As to the value of the property, I will read a telegram received by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOVE], who wired the sheriff of the county and asked him what the property of General Clay was assessed at, and here is his reply:

Gen. C. M. Clay's property assessed at $20,000. No incumbrance; only a life interest.

H. H. COLYER.

That is the information upon which I base my statement, and that ought to be sufficient property to carry him along with the $25 a month. I did not say that he did not render distinguished services, but I said the report of the committee did not show that he had incurred any disability of service origin, that his services in the war had not afflicted him in any way, and that he is perfectly sound as far as his physical health is concerned. He is old; but, as the distinguished chairman said, we do not care to pension him on account of his age. I do not intend to do an injustice to anybody.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I have never objected to paying the largest pension recommended by the committee on a single occasion in this Congress. I am in favor of liberal pensions to needy soldiers. I am not in favor, however, of paying large pensions to men who served but little in the Army, and who are amply able to live without it, and who contracted no disease and received no wound in line of duty. Now, from the report made here, Cassius M. Clay served in the Union Army exactly six months.

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, you are mistaken.

Mr. GREENE. Look at your report. He was in charge of some organization called the Cassius M. Clay Guards, but, according to the report, there is no evidence that they were ever mustered into the service of the United States at all. He enlisted in the Union Army and was made a major-general, and served, if I recollect, exactly six months to a day in actual service, and resigned his command to be made minister to a foreign country. Now, if I am mistaken I would like to be corrected, but I think you will find that I am not mistaken. In your report you say he was assigned to duty September 11, 1862, and his resignation was accepted March 11, 1863. Just six months in the service of his country in the war of the rebellion, according to these figures, and that was as a major-general.

There is no evidence that he received any wounds; there is no evidence that he ever saw a man in rebel uniform; there is no evidence that he incurred any disease. He is a man 80 years of age at the present time; but, for anything that appears, is in reasonably good health for a man of that age. In the last few years he has married a young wife, as we all know. I apprehend he is in fairly good condition physically for a man of his age. He has nobody dependent upon him at all, as I am informed by gentlemen who claim to know.

He has a life estate in a large body of the very best land, and, I am informed, in the State of Kentucky, the blue grass region—an estate which is assessed for taxation at $20,000; and I think all gentlemen in this House know that property is never overestimated for taxation purposes. So it is fair to assume that the property under the control of this gentleman is at least of the value of $20,000.

Now, I do not believe it is right or just, while there are so many thousands of old soldiers almost destitute, whose claims are now before this Congress, who have been knocking at the doors of Congress for years for relief and have failed to get it, to pass by those old, sick, and helpless soldiers to pension a man who is, according to the best information we have, in elegant circumstances.

The report says that he has not means to meet his current expenses. Now, I do not know what his current expenses are. I apprehend, however, that if we are to support Cassius M. Clay according to his idea of living, $50 a month and the proceeds of a large blue-grass farm in Kentucky would scarcely be sufficient. But I do not believe that this man, who served only six months, as I remember, in the Union Army, who contracted no disease, and who has $20,000 of unencumbered property for taxation, ought to be pensioned at the sum of $50 a month, while so many thousands of old soldiers and their widows, who are almost destitute, are put off with a pittance of $3, $10, or $12 a month, and some of them with practically nothing. This is all I care to say.

Mr. SETTLE obtained the floor.

Mr. RAY of New York. Before the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SETTLE] proceeds, let me correct one error of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. GREENE], lest it be forgotten. The gentleman has stated that the report shows that this man served only six months in the Union Army. The report shows that as a major-general on active duty in the field in command of the Department of the Gulf he served about a year. That is one thing. Besides, he served in the Mexican war—all through it. And then he, at another time, served here in the defenses of Washington.

Mr. GIBSON. Without cost to the Government.

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; without cost to the Government.

Now, we should have the facts as they are, and no misrepresentations. I know the gentleman from Nebraska does not intend to misrepresent. He is simply mistaken; that is all.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to offer in support of this bill and against the amendment.

Mr. GREENE. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word before he proceeds with his remarks? Let me call the attention of the House to what this report does state.

Mr. SETTLE. The gentleman can follow me.

Mr. GREENE. I shall not occupy more than a moment. I read from the report:

The records also show that Cassius M. Clay was captain and major of a military organization designated "The Cassius M. Clay Battalion" or "Washington Clay Guards," the members of which tendered their services to the Government in April, 1861, for the defense of the city of Washington until the arrival of the troops called for by the President's proclamation of April 15, 1861.

There is no evidence that the organization was mustered into the military service of the United States, and there are no records of the force on file, excepting two manuscript rosters containing the names of the officers and enlisted men composing the organization, dated, respectively, April 18 and 23, 1861, and a manuscript roster of the officers of the battalion, dated April 23, 1861. These rosters do not show the period of service of the organization nor how long Cassius M. Clay commanded it.

It is further shown by the records that Cassius M. Clay was commissioned major-general of volunteers April 15, 1862, to rank from April 11, 1862; that he accepted the appointment June 17, 1862; that on September 11, 1862, he was assigned to duty in the Department of the Gulf, and that his resignation as major-general of volunteers was accepted March 11, 1863.

Now let gentlemen figure it out, from September 11, 1862, to March 11, 1863, and see whether General Clay served over six months in actual service.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman must not misrepresent the facts. Because Cassius M. Clay was not assigned to duty in the Department of the Gulf until September, 1862, it does not follow that he did not serve in the fore part of that year. He did.

The committee could not give every item and every day of his service as a soldier. They merely state the fact that he was given that important command at that time.

Mr. GREENE. Well, he was assigned to duty September 11, 1862.

Mr. RAY of New York. At that point.

Mr. GREENE. And on March 11, just six months afterwards, he resigned—six months to a day; and there is, I repeat, no evidence that he ever was in actual service at any other time.

Mr. SETTLE. I understand that the gentleman from Nebraska and other gentlemen who are opposing this bill are for the amendment; therefore they consider this a pensionable case.

Mr. GREENE. No; I do not.

A MEMBER. The only difference seems to be as to the amount of the pension.

Mr. SETTLE. Certainly the gentleman from South Carolina is committed by his amendment.

Mr. TALBERT. In view of the fact that this man served in the Mexican war, and in view of his age, I am in favor of granting him a pension of reasonable amount.

Mr. SETTLE. Well, it is in view of his age and of the other circumstances in the case that the committee propose to make the pension $50.

Now, as to the financial condition of General Clay, I am not so well advised as I should like to be. But my information is, and has been for the last few years—before ever the thought of a pension for General Clay was suggested—that although he is in control of a large landed estate in Madison County, it is that character of estate that is utterly unproductive. He has a fine house on it, but the income amounts to nothing. He has a wife; he has sons. And if there is any man in this Union to whom the Republican party owes a special debt of gratitude, it is this man.

I remember, sir, that in 1860 or 1861, when I was but a small lad in the city of Frankfort, Gen. Cassius M. Clay was an abolitionist. They were few then. He came to Frankfort to make a speech. They refused to let him have the court-house. Of course I, in common with all the other lads and almost everybody else in Frankfort, thought that was a wise and proper thing for the people to do.

We had no use for abolitionists. But he was not dismayed. He spoke in the rotunda of the State capitol. He had an immense crowd to hear him, and before he began his speech he pulled out two revolvers and he said, "Now, Mr. Reporter, put that down in the beginning of my speech," and he spoke to that assembled crowd. He was a man of his convictions, true to duty at a time when to be true and loyal meant disaster and perhaps personal violence and death.

And then I remember another instance, when he did not agree with you Republicans, in the campaign of 1876, when the wave of Tilden and reform spread over this country. I was at Cincinnati, and he was advertised to speak there on Walnut Hills, and the crowd attempted to play the same game upon him in 1876 that the Frankfort crowd had attempted to play away back in the sixties, but the General, though he was an older man, had lost none of his courage. He declared that he would speak and speak as he pleased, and speak he did.

That is the kind of a man he is. He is a Republican to-day. He is a man who knows not the first principle of fear, and he has battled for the Republican party since its infancy. He is to-day respected all over the State of Kentucky for his fearless and intrepid character. I ask this House to stand by the bill, and in view of his age, and in view of his services in the Mexican war, and in view of his services in the late war, to give him this $50. He will not draw it long. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARDY. I simply want to confirm what my colleague has said in reference to Gen. Cassius M. Clay. I know him personally. He is a distinguished citizen of Kentucky. He is not of my politics, but I have a high esteem for him individually. He is now over 80 years old. It is true that he has several hundred acres of fairly good land, or at least a part of it is, with a fine house on it; but fine houses and lands do not support people unless they can be worked and made profitable.

I understand from those who are better informed than myself that it is with considerable difficulty that he is able now to make a living and to keep up the place in respectably good style. He has no property of his own. He has a life estate in this property, which I presume is correctly taxed at $20,000. But you remember that this tax has to be paid, and it is paid with great difficulty, because this farm is unproductive.

Now, I believe, in consideration of the service which he has rendered to the State and to the nation, that he ought to have this pension. I do not desire to say anything further, but the idea that he is a rich man now, with a large income, I think is not true. His pension can not last him many years. As I said, he is over 80 years old. He has a young wife to provide for. Although they may not live together all the time, she is still his wife, as I understand, and of course he desires to care for her and leave her in comfortable circumstances. I think the bill ought to be allowed to stand as it came from the Senate.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I want to say here that nobody in this House has any higher respect for Cassius M. Clay, of Kentucky, personally than I have, not being personally acquainted with him. But I have never understood it to be the policy of this Government to pension men because they were distinguished citizens, and because they carried pistols and bowie knives and laid them out on a rostrum and said they intended to make speeches, as the gentleman from Kentucky says Mr. Clay did.

Mr. GIBSON. Unless they are from Kentucky!

Mr. GREENE. I have never understood it to be the policy of this Government to pension a man because he is a distinguished citizen of Kentucky or because he is a distinguished citizen of any other State in the Union. I understand it to be the policy of this Government to pension men who are deserving of pensions because of the fact of disabilities incurred in the service of their country in the first instance. I understand that the Government has wisely extended that policy so that when a soldier becomes old and infirm and poor the Government will beneficently extend to him a pension covering disabilities not actually received in the line of service. At least, we have adopted that policy in this House, and I approve of it.

Mr. MARSH. There is nothing in the law that requires a soldier to be poor in order to get a pension.

Mr. GREENE. I understand there is nothing requiring him to be poor. I have said it is the policy of this Government to pension soldiers for disabilities received in the line of duty. That is the policy of this Government, but that has been extended by this committee and by this House, liberally extended, and rightly extended, I take it—

Mr. MARSH. It is extended by the law of 1890.

Mr. GREENE. To meet cases where persons are in actual need, to provide for their needs when they are old and poor; and I would vote to pension any old soldier if he were in actual need and diseased, whether he contracted his disease in line of duty or not.

Mr. MARSH. Yes; but the law of 1890 does not require that the soldier shall say that he is a poor man.

Mr. GREENE. I so understand it, but we have a case before us in which there is not a scintilla of evidence that this man was injured or received any wound or disability in the line of duty.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Now, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Do you favor the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. GREENE. Oh, I am opposed to the whole bill, but will submit to the bill as amended.

Mr. NORTHWAY. You will vote against the whole thing?

Mr. GREENE. I do not believe it is the policy of this Government to pension a man, I say, simply because he is a distinguished citizen. I do not believe it is the policy of this Government to pension a gentleman who served only six months in line of duty, and from the day that Mr. Cassius M. Clay was assigned to duty it was exactly six months to a day until he tendered his resignation to accept the position of foreign minister.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Is the fact that he is a distinguished citizen any objection to his receiving a pension?

Mr. GREENE. None whatever, and no reason why he should. I am weary of hearing it urged that men are distinguished citizens as a reason why rights should be given them to which they are not entitled.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But of course it is no reason why he should not.

Mr. GREENE. It cuts no figure in the case whether he is a distinguished or an undistinguished citizen. That has nothing to do with the matter. But there is no evidence here, I repeat, that he received a wound or incurred any disability in the line of duty. The evidence before this House is conclusive that he has property largely in excess of that possessed by thousands and multiplied thousands of the soldiers and their widows in this country who are drawing $8 and $12 a month, and many none at all.

I say it is not right, simply because a man is distinguished, to throw $50 a month into his purse, when he can live without it, and at the same time pay men who are poor and diseased and who carried their muskets for three or four years from $6 to $13 per month. I want to see justice done the men who fought our battles, and if any should receive large pensions it should be the men who are poor and not those who are rich. The gentleman from Kentucky suggests that this large pension is necessary to enable the pensioner to live in the "style" he requires. We are not paying pensions to enable the soldiers to live in "style," but in comfort. Many of them live in poverty. These latter should first have the attention of Congress. Let us first provide for their wants, and then if we have money to waste it would look better to talk about living in style.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a difference of opinion. Numbers of gentlemen here think that this distinguished citizen of Kentucky ought not to receive anything. Others think that he ought to receive a pension. Now, in view of this fact, I think it will be a very happy compromise to adopt the amendment that I have offered, that we strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five." I hope there will be no objection to the amendment, and I ask that the committee now vote upon that amendment. This gentleman is not drawing any pension now.

The question being taken on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. TALBERT, on a division (demanded by Mr. SETTLE) there were—ayes 30, noes 27.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, it is too late.

Mr. SETTLE. I will not insist upon that, in view of the fact that it might disclose the want of a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] is agreed to. The question now is upon the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. It seems to me that the amendment that I offered is in lieu of the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are other committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TALBERT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, the title of the bill was amended as recommended by the committee.

J. O. HOTTENSTEIN.

The next bill on the Calendar of Unfinished Business was the bill (H. R. 9295) for the relief of J. O. Hottenstein.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of J. O. Hottenstein, of Humboldt, Kans., late of Company G, Twentieth Illinois Infantry, said pension to be at the rate of $24 per month.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out the capital "J" and insert "Justin" in lieu thereof.

In same line strike out the words "of Humboldt, Kans."

In line 7 strike out all after the word "Infantry" and insert in lieu thereof "and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Justin O. Hottenstein."

In line 8 strike out "twenty-four" and insert "thirty."

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer an amendment to the amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole, in line 8, by striking out "thirty," as offered by the committee, and inserting "fifty."

The facts in this case, Mr. Speaker, illustrate one of the grossest injustices done by our Pension Department, an injustice which it is the prerogative of this House to correct. The facts in the case show that Lieutenant Hottenstein, a loyal German-American, enlisted from the State of Illinois in 1861.

He was mustered in April 24 of that year. He was discharged, as shown by the committee report, June 25, 1864, having become totally disabled from further military duty by reason of gunshot wound through his left breast and lung, received in battle, and chronic diarrhea contracted in the service and in line of duty. He has never recovered, and now suffers from an abscess, the result of the wound in the lung. He has heart trouble and disease of the digestive organs. On June 25, 1864, he was pensioned at $12.75 per month for gunshot wound through left breast and lung. This was increased to $18 from February 21, 1876, and to $24 from February 3, 1883. This was reduced to $17 from March 4, 1886, and many applications for increase have been rejected.

On the second page of the report the committee state the reduction of this man's pension from $24 to $17 a month was without excuse or justification. The increase of this pension to $30 a month would require three years and more to make up for the injustice done him by the Pension Bureau. I urge that this loyal soldier's pension be placed at such an amount as will do him justice according to the committee's report. I make a plea for simple justice to a plain, common soldier.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to the debt of gratitude which this nation owes, and which it seems to me at this time we might appropriately recognize, to our foreign-born citizens. Although the statistics show that only 15 per cent of our population is foreign born, the Secretary of War reports that to-day over 25 per cent of our Army are of foreign birth, and the Secretary of the Navy reports that in our Navy of the petty officers over 52 per cent are of foreign birth, and of the enlisted seamen over 42 per cent are of foreign birth. Of those who were destroyed in the Maine—258—104 were of foreign birth.

The statistics also show that among our citizens the smallest percentage of illiteracy is among the children of parents of foreign birth; and so at this time, when we are entering upon a foreign war, these facts are brought distinctly before us, that our foreign-born citizens avail themselves most largely of the privileges of our educational institutions and in the largest proportion enter the service of the Army and Navy in defense of our national honor.

I simply call the attention of the House to these facts, and ask that in the case of this humble man—this Lieutenant Hottenstein, of Illinois, who enlisted as a private and rose through the ranks from private to first lieutenant, who was totally disabled after three years' service by a gunshot wound through the lungs—his pension be increased to such an amount as to mete out to him simple justice for his loyalty, bravery, and self-sacrifice. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, the committee, after a careful examination of the facts of this case, reported the bill to the House at $24. When we found that long ago the Pension Office had restored his pension to where it ought to be, at the meeting of the House on a Friday night I made a motion that we give him an increase above that, to $30 per month, which would more than compensate him for all that he lost by being cut down.

This man is not totally disabled. It is true that he was shot through the shoulder and through the lung—a very bad wound—and that he received a wound in the shoulder blade. There is an abscess through which at times there are discharges, but when we give this man $30 a month, who now lives somewhere in Kansas, we are giving him more than has been received or is being received by the great mass of soldiers who occupy the same position and who suffer from disabilities much greater than his, at least equally as great.

When we take into consideration the fact that we are adding every day to the pension roll, that we are paying $150,000,000 a year, and the fact that by the time this war with Spain is over we will undoubtedly be paying annually more than $200,000,000 to pensioners, we should be cautious, go slow, be reasonable and conservative in our action, and, above all, be consistent. Let us do substantial justice to all, but treat all similarly circumstanced in the same way. There is not a fact in the case that will justify giving more than $30 in this case. I now call for the previous question upon the bill and the amendments.

Mr. PETERS. Just one moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RAY of New York. I call for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. PETERS. Just a word. I desire to make a statement before the gentleman does that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York calls for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the committee amendment.

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this bill was introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS], I ask unanimous consent that he be given an opportunity to address the House.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object.

Mr. RAY of New York. I call for the regular order. The bill has been fully discussed at a Friday night session, and prolonged discussion here delays meritorious bills.

The question was taken; and the amendment offered by Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois was rejected.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended as recommended by the committee.

HOUSE BILLS PASSED.

In the case of the following House bills, some with amendments and some without amendments, reported from the Committee of the Whole, the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were severally agreed to, and the bills, with those reported without amendments, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, as to each and every one of the bills passed this afternoon and this evening on the Calendar of Unfinished Business, I move to reconsider the several votes whereby they were passed, and to lay that motion on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

BELLE PETER.

The bill (H. R. 8090) for the relief of the widow of the late Henry W. Peter, late contract surgeon of the United States Army, was read, the committee amendments agreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. The title was amended.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar under the rule which has been read.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole [Mr. LACEY in the chair] for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that only bills be taken up where the member who introduced them is present, Senate bills excepted.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, Mr. SHERMAN, of New York, was called home on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If it will save time, I will except that case.

Mr. RAY of New York. I told him to go and see some of the members—

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Omitting that case, I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that in the call of bills on the Calendar those only be called where the member who introduced them is present, excepting Senate bills and excepting also the bill referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have House bill 6535, introduced by the gentleman from New York, Mr. SULZER, excepted. He has been here every night, and asked me to except that bill, as he has been called away.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, my colleague, Mr. PITNEY, of New Jersey, has a bill, H. R. 7989, on the Calendar. He has been uniformly present at the Friday night sessions, and I would like to have that excepted.

A MEMBER. The regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is called for. The Clerk will report the first bill.

WILLIAM HAZELBECK.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8854) to correct the military record of William Hazelbeck, of Portsmouth, Ohio.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove from the military record of William Hazelbeck, of Portsmouth, Ohio, any charge of desertion that may exist against him, and to grant him an honorable discharge.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to have the report read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8854) to correct the military record of William Hazelbeck, of Portsmouth, Ohio, having examined the same, recommend that it pass as amended.

In line 3, after the word "Ohio," insert the words "late bugler of Company H, Eleventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry;" and after the word "discharge," in line 7, add the following:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act."

According to the report received from the War Department, which is appended hereto, it appears that this soldier "was present with his command at its muster out," and that "there is nothing to show that he was in a status of dishonor at that time;" also, that it had been determined by the Department "that he was honorably mustered out with his company July 14, 1863."

It is therefore the opinion of your committee that the charge of desertion should be removed.

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, June 23, 1897.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 14th, received on the 15th instant, in which you requested that the military record of Mr. William Hazelbeck, of Portsmouth, Ohio, late bugler, Company H, Eleventh Regiment Ohio Cavalry Volunteers, be furnished you, and referring also to the letter addressed to you by this Department on June 15, 1897, in which you were informed that it had been found necessary in the investigation of the case to call upon another Department of the Government for certain essential information, I am directed by the Secretary of War to inform you that the records show that one William Hazelbeck (also borne as Hazelbeck) was enrolled August 1, 1863, and mustered into the service March 7, 1864, as a private in Company H, Eleventh Ohio Cavalry Volunteers, to serve three years.

He appears to have served faithfully until October 12, 1865, when he deserted, remaining absent from his command without authority until on or about July 1, 1866, when it appears that he returned thereto. No record has been found showing whether any action was taken relative to the charge of desertion standing against him.

Inasmuch as he was present with his command at its muster out, and as there is nothing to show that he was in a status of dishonor at that time, it has been determined by this Department that he was honorably mustered out with his company July 14, 1866.

It will be noticed that this soldier was absent in desertion from October 12, 1865, until on or about July 1, 1866, when he returned to his command; but inasmuch as he did not return to his command within a reasonable time, the charge of desertion can not be removed under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1860, which is the only law now in force governing the subject of the removal of charges of desertion.

Very respectfully,

F. C. AINSWORTH.

Colonel, United States Army, Chief Record and Pension Office.

Hon. L. J. FENTON,
House of Representatives.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to hear a statement from the gentleman.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Chairman, the report has been read, and it was a unanimous report by the Committee on Military Affairs. The charge of desertion was only a technical one. The soldier was present with his command when it was mustered out, and the report says there was nothing to show that he was in any status of dishonor at that time.

Mr. TALBERT. Did the gentleman from Ohio introduce the bill?

Mr. FENTON. I did.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that in the proceedings of this evening we consider only those bills which have been introduced by members who are now present. I make this proposition as a motion.

Mr. RAY of New York. Unanimous consent, I believe, has already been given to that proposition.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. No; it has not.

Mr. RAY of New York. I thought it had.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. No, sir. The regular order was called upon the proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I suggest, in view of the statement of the gentleman from New York, that this is a very wise and salutary rule. It favors the diligent; it induces members to be here looking after their bills and taking care of them. I had hoped there would be no objection to the request for unanimous consent. I make this now as a motion, unless the objection is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. It is moved by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] that in the further progress of business this evening in Committee of the Whole only such House bills be considered as have been introduced by members who are present at this evening's session.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN H. SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8190) granting an honorable discharge to John H. Smith (introduced by Mr. KERR).

The bill was read, as follows:

Smith, late private in Company F, Twelfth Regiment Ohio Cavalry, and late private in Company B, One hundred and twenty-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, be corrected, and that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant him an honorable discharge from the said Company B, One hundred and twenty-fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

After the last word in line 9, add:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

Mr. TALBERT. I wish to ask whether the gentleman who introduced this bill is present?

Mr. KERR. Yes, sir; it was introduced by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the committee amendment.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I understood the rule to be that before a bill is read it shall be announced who introduced it, and whether he is present or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is noticing whether the member is present or not before he reads the bill.

WILLIAM HENRY SMITH.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I should like to inquire if the rule adopted is being adhered to?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the Clerk is noting the presence of members before reading the bills.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, Senate bill 4003, Calendar No., 688, was passed over and not read by the Clerk. That is simply a private pension bill, and it is in order now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that that bill has been acted upon. It passed the House to-day by unanimous consent.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then why is it on the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. It was on the Calendar when this Calendar was printed, but it is off the Calendar now. It has passed the House.

SAMUEL H. BECKWITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7806) granting an increase of pension to S. H. Beckwith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of S. H. Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Indiana in behalf of one of his own colleagues, Mr. HEMENWAY. He has been here a great many times, and the committee have turned down three or four bills of his. Here is a most worthy and deserving case, and I ask that unanimous consent be given that Mr. HEMENWAY's bill be considered.

Mr. BERRY. I object, and ask for an enforcement of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM MELLICOTT, ALIAS WILLIAM REED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5707) for the removal of the charge of desertion against William Mellicott, alias William Reed, late of Company G, Eighth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, and legalizing his service in Company E, Eleventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the charge of desertion standing against William Mellicott, who enlisted and served as William Reed in Company G, Eighth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, is hereby removed, and that he be held and deemed to be properly transferred to Company E, Eleventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, and his service therein hereby made legal and valid.

Mr. LOVE. I would like to have the report read in that case.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I would state to the gentleman from Mississippi that this man enlisted in the Eighth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry. Afterwards the Eleventh Tennessee was formed of his neighbors and acquaintances, and, not being satisfied with his membership in the Eighth, he was received into the Eleventh on a promise of his colonel to exchange for him one of his own men with the Eighth Regiment. And he served with the Eleventh Regiment until he was captured and afterwards died.

There was no law authorizing the transfer to be made, and his name still appearing on the rolls of the Eighth, and no record of any discharge, he was marked a deserter. This removes that charge, and is done for the benefit of the widow that she may get a pension. That is the report of the committee.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

SUSAN D. YATES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1623) to increase the pension of Susan D. Yates.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll of the United States the name of Susan D. Yates, widow of Capt. Arthur Reid Yates, late of the United States Navy, at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the amount now being received.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, the Senate has passed a bill of the same purport and effect, granting an increase of pension to Susan D. Yates. The bill is now on the Speaker's table, and I move to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the Senate bill. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4491) granting an increase of pension to Susan D. Yates.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan D. Yates, widow of Capt. Arthur Reid Yates, late of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. LOVE. Is the Senate bill for the same amount as the House bill?

Mr. RAY of New York. The Senate bill gives $10 more than the House bill, and I wish to move an amendment; but the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] desires to be heard before that is done.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I simply wish to state to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that this is a bill for the relief of the widow of a comrade and brother officer of mine in the Navy during the late war, who is now left in very seriously reduced circumstances and greatly in need of this aid. The bill was introduced in the last Congress and favorably reported to the House, but by reason of delays it failed to receive consideration. The House committee this year reported the bill and reduced the amount by $10 a month. The Senate has since passed the bill at the original figure.

In view of all the circumstances in this case, my connection with it being purely a labor of love, the officer whose widow this bill is to benefit having served with me, and knowing personally of his gallantry and the long and arduous service that he rendered during the war and after he was really disabled by sickness, and knowing the tireless devotion of his widow to him during all his illness, and the fact that she is now obliged to support her daughters and her helpless, invalid father out of her scanty means, I ask the House to grant her the aid she so sorely needs by passing the Senate bill.

Mr. SIMS. What pension is she now getting?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Thirty dollars a month.

Mr. GAINES. For how long?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will get the date of his death.

Mr. SIMS. What is the House report?

Mr. RAY of New York. Forty dollars.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The House committee reports in favor of giving her $40 a month, but rather than send the bill to conference I ask the adoption of the Senate bill, which will simply give this widow that which has been given to a large number of the associates of her husband. As to his service, and I know gentlemen will accept my statement, I will say that I personally know that he was a noble, brave officer, who rendered exceedingly distinguished and valuable services.

He was Farragut's flag lieutenant in the great battle of Mobile Bay; was repeatedly commended for gallantry during the famous operations of the great Admiral's fleet, and, subsequent to the war, was largely instrumental in establishing and perfecting our system of naval apprentices. No more worthy case than this has ever come to my knowledge.

Mr. RAY of New York. I will read the facts given in the report, and then the House can determine for itself:

Arthur Reid Yates was appointed acting midshipman in the United States Navy September 24, 1863, and graduated June 10, 1867, served through the civil war with honor and distinction, rose to the rank of captain in the Navy, and died in the service from diseases and disabilities incurred therein and in line of duty November 4, 1891.

He was a most brave, fearless, and efficient officer, and remained on duty when suffering from severe disabilities. This claimant was his faithful wife during nearly thirty years of his service, and while he was in a very serious condition physically was his devoted nurse and attendant.

Now, those are the facts appearing to the committee.

Mr. SIMS. You make it $40 and the Senate make it $50.

Mr. LOVE. How long has she been receiving $30?

Mr. RAY of New York. Only since 1891.

Mr. SIMS. I move to make it $40 instead of $50.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I hope the gentleman will waive that. I very seldom make an appeal of this kind to the House.

Mr. SIMS. We have been acting in our committee all the time upon the principle of giving $30 to widows. I mean the committee of which I am a member. I therefore ask that the Senate bill be amended so that it will read $40 instead of $50.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I hope the House will give my statement of the great services of this widow's husband the benefit of the $10, and pass the Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to amend the Senate bill so as to read "$40" instead of "$50."

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that he was in doubt.

Thereupon the committee divided; and the Chair announced there were—ayes 14, noes 27.

So the motion to amend was rejected.

The Senate bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ROBERT M'FARLAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 360) for the relief of Robert McFarland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to remove the charge of dishonorable discharge against Robert McFarland, late corporal in Company B, Fifth Regiment Illinois Cavalry, and to issue to him an honorable discharge from the service of the United States, with pay and bounty, and to date October 30, 1866.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out the words "with pay and bounty," in line 7.
Also strike out the word "and" before the word "to," in line 8.
Insert, after the word "sixty-six," in line 8, the following:
"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.
The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARGARET THOMAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4251) granting a pension to Margaret Thomas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Margaret Thomas, as widow of John S. Thomas, late a private in Company I, Thirty-sixth Ohio Infantry, and Company D, Fifth United States Veteran Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month, with the usual allowance for minor children.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out "twelve" and insert "eight" in lieu thereof.
In line 9 strike out "with the usual allowance for minor children" and insert in lieu thereof the words "and also $2 per month in addition, on account of each of her minor children during their minority."

The committee amendments were agreed to.
The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

VIRGINIA C. FLEANOR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4916) granting a pension to Virginia C. Fleanor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll of the United States the name of Virginia C. Fleanor, of Nora Springs, Floyd County, Iowa, remarried widow of Col. Henry Daugherty, deceased, a veteran of the Mexican war, and colonel of the Twenty-second Illinois Infantry, at the rate of $12 per month.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In lines 5 and 6 strike out the words "of Nora Springs, Floyd County Iowa, remarried."
In line 8, after the word "Infantry," insert the words "and pay her a pension."
In line 9 strike out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."
In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "of the United States."

Mr. LOVE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. This is the widow of a colonel, and the amendment gives her what she would have had if she had been pensioned at the Pension Office. It is the regular army rate.

Mr. LOVE. Why was it put at $12 a month?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Because there was a mistake in drafting the bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. There was a mistake in drafting the bill. She is clearly entitled to what we give her. She is not only a widow of a soldier, but she was a faithful nurse in the Army.

Mr. LOVE. I could not understand why she was pensioned at $12.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. It was a mistake of the clerk in drafting the bill.

Mr. BERRY. Why can not she get it at the Pension Office?

Mr. RAY of New York. It is a case of remarriage.

Mr. BERRY. Well, she knew it when she was remarried.

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes, but she is a widow again. She is a widow of good character, very poor, and she was the wife of a soldier during the war and a nurse also.

Mr. GIBSON. Her husband served in the Mexican war.

Mr. TALBERT. She really saved the Government money while she was married.

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; but we do not put it on that ground.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SAMUEL RACEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6718) for the relief of Samuel Racey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion appearing on the records of the Adjutant-General United States Army against Samuel Racey, late private, Company K, Thirtieth Ohio Infantry, and that a certificate of honorable discharge be issued to said soldier as of date September 29, 1864.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Add after the word "sixty-four," in line 9, the following:
"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.
The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGE S. WALTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7841) granting an increase of pension to George S. Walton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to George S. Walton, late of Company N, Second Missouri Cavalry, Mexican war, a pension of $40 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In line 5 strike out "Cavalry" and substitute therefor "Mounted Volunteers."
In line 6 strike out "forty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-four."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

On motion of Mr. BURROWS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

ARANZAS PASS HARBOR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to prepare and submit plans, specifications, and estimates for the improvement of Aransas Pass Harbor, State of Texas, and especially to make plans and estimates for the removal of the sand bar at Aransas Pass and the deepening of the channel across said bar to a depth of at least 20 feet and a width of at least 150 feet at the bottom, so as to furnish an inlet for the passage of vessels from the Gulf of Mexico into Aransas Harbor; and report such plans to Congress, and also whether in his judgment such improvement should be made.

Mr. MILLS. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution. It is simply a resolution calling for information.

Mr. BERRY. I did not understand fully from the reading the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. MILLS. It calls for information from the Secretary of War about Aransas Pass, to be submitted to Congress at the next session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BERRY. I ask if that is the point where outside parties have made a contract to improve the harbor?

Mr. MILLS. That relates simply to Aransas Pass, but the resolution calls on the Secretary of War to submit at the next session of Congress his estimates for the improvement of the harbor, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I now offer the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland proposes an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the word "Corporations," in line 4, page 59, to and including line 9, page 61, and all from the word "and," in line 17, page 61, to and including line 24, page 62, and insert the following:

That from and after the passage of this act every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing or having the care or management of any railroad, street railroad, sleeping car, steamboat, ship, or other vessel, engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or freight for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, or carrying on or doing an express business, or having the care or management of any telegraphic or telephone line by which telegraphic or telephone dispatches or messages are received or transmitted, or carrying on or doing the business of furnishing gas or electric light, electric power, steam heat, or steam power, or refining petroleum, or refining sugar, or owning or controlling any pipe line for transporting oil or other products, whose gross annual receipts exceed $50,000, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax equivalent to one-half of 1 per cent on the gross amount of all receipts of such persons, firms, corporations, and companies in their respective businesses: Provided, That the assessment hereby made shall not include any amount for the receipts for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails between the United States and any foreign port; but such tax shall be rated for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails from a port within the United States through a foreign territory to a port within the United States, and shall be assessed upon and collected from persons, firms, companies, or corporations within the United States receiving hire or pay for such transportation of persons, freight, or mails.

And a true and accurate return of the amount of gross receipts as aforesaid shall be made and rendered monthly by each of such associations, corporations, companies, or persons to the collector of the district in which any such association, corporation, or company may be located, or in which such person has his place of business. Such return shall be verified under oath by the person making the same, or, in case of corporations, by the president or chief officer thereof. Any person failing or refusing to make return as aforesaid, or who shall make a false or fraudulent return, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000 for each and every false or fraudulent return.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from Maryland to accept an amendment in line 5, page 2, striking out "one-half" and making the rate one-fourth of 1 per cent. The committee, after most earnest consideration of this question, seems to have fixed one-fourth of 1 per cent as a proper amount which should be levied on the gross receipts, and I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that he accept that amendment.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I hope the amendment suggested by the Senator from West Virginia will not be made. I think it would decrease the amount of revenue which ought to be levied from corporations and perhaps interfere with the tax that we may be able to collect under the law. I think one-half of 1 per cent on gross receipts is small enough, and especially when the minimum of $250,000 is fixed, which will relieve most of the corporations from this tax altogether.

I think so further in view of the estimate, which I think is not well founded, submitted by the honorable Senator from Maryland. He takes the aggregate of the receipts of telegraph companies, the receipts of railroad companies, the receipts of street-car companies, and the receipts of the other corporations mentioned in this section, but in taking that aggregate, which is essentially an aggregate or compilation of all the receipts of such companies and corporations in the United States, it necessarily embraces many small companies that as corporations will not be subject to the tax at all. It embraces all receipts and all corporations and makes the aggregate, but as to the majority of the corporations the receipts will not reach $250,000, and consequently the aggregate will be largely reduced. That is one of the reasons why I shall be opposed to a reduction of the tax from one-half of 1 per cent to one-fourth of 1 per cent.

There is another amendment which I think ought to be made. I did not understand whether the honorable Senator from West Virginia offered his amendment simply as a suggestion.

Mr. FAULKNER. I offered the amendment and asked the Senator from Maryland to accept it.

Mr. TURPIE. Another amendment which I think ought to be made I will suggest. I have given the reasons why I think the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia should not succeed. It is in lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of the amendment, page 3, and refers to the penalty. It is useless, sir, to make a levy of taxes for any purposes without a penalty, and without a penalty or sanction sufficient to enforce collection.

Now, in the first section, in relation to the returns, the false or fraudulent return is made under the penalty of perjury. That is sufficiently secure. I do not think there will be any false or fraudulent return. Notwithstanding the unscrupulousness of certain persons in the management of the corporations, none of them will be willing to undertake the pains and penalties of perjury or to run the risk of prosecution for that offense. The truth is, however, that although there may be no false or fraudulent return, there will be in many cases no return at all under this law, because the mere fine of not less than $1,000 and not exceeding

"$10,000" is an entirely insufficient penalty. The corporation subject to a fine of $1,000 will make a calculation and ascertain whether it is cheaper to pay the fine or to make a return, and in all cases where the tax of one-half of 1 per cent is greater upon gross receipts than the amount of the fine there will be simply a return of the fine, and it will be charged up to the expenses of the litigation.

I think the only way of putting a safe penalty upon this amendment is to make imprisonment a part of the penalty for failing to make a return. I would therefore suggest that the provision in relation to the fine stand as it does, "not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000 for each and every false or fraudulent return," and that for every conviction of the same offense there shall also be imprisonment for not less than six months and not exceeding two years. That, I think, would be a safe sanction in such a case.

I do not care how severe the levy of taxes may be made or what may be the machinery which may be employed in relation to its collection, unless there may be a penalty of sufficient severity it is entirely useless. The provision of the honorable Senator from Maryland is very much as if a man tied with great care the mouth of a sack filled with potatoes and then should take a knife and rip the bottom of the sack open. There will be no and can be no practical safety in adopting such a penalty. There will be always an evasion of the collection of the tax.

I heard the Senator from Maryland speak on the general subject of reducing the penalty the other day. I heard him with great pleasure, as I always do. But I think that the reduction can be carried to too great extent. The Senator instanced a case where men were brought up really because they professed certain political opinions and had made themselves offensive to the party in power, who were dragged from home a great distance, were arraigned before corrupt judges, were brought before packed juries, and sentenced for political purposes. I have heard of that from the honorable Senator from Maryland and I entirely agree in the condemnation of those practices.

I have even a more intense hatred of that method of judicial proceedings than the honorable Senator from Maryland can entertain, or either of us can express, because I have been a member of the bar and I have been placed in defense of persons so indicted and prosecuted. I have been nearer than he has been to the loathsome ermine which clothes the miscreants who are willing to sell justice and barter judgment. I have, sir, a deeper abiding hatred for that method of judicial proceeding and that method of judicial prosecution. But I do not believe the Senator has offered the proper remedy. Even in this case, as where a person is unjustly convicted and is simply the martyr or victim of political prosecution, the fine would be paid by the offender who was rich; the imprisonment would be suffered by the offender who was poor, for part of the sentence, even in the fine, is that he shall be fined and imprisoned until the fine be paid or replevined.

I think, therefore, that imprisonment should be made a part of the punishment in the special instance mentioned in the amendment and in all such instances for a willful violation of the revenue laws, such as are provided for in every section of this act. The act is very liberal in general. It provides for the case of ignorance, inattention, distance from the place where stamps are sold. All these contingencies were mentioned and provided for, so that this offense must be deliberate, it must be willful; and I think that when one is adjudged guilty, it is no more than proper punishment that imprisonment should be a portion of the penalty.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I offered the amendment because I myself believe that we ought to tax corporations under the necessities which are confronting the Government at this time, and yet that one-half of 1 per cent on gross receipts is a very heavy tax to impose upon them. Many of the corporations involved in the amendment of the Senator from Maryland will not really be earning any dividends at all, and it is proposed that the gross receipts of corporations over $250,000, no matter what may be the deficit or the liability owing to difference between receipts and disbursements, shall pay a tax of one-half of 1 per cent.

A few companies can, of course, pay this tax without feeling it. At the same time I do not think it is fair and just that 100 per cent should be added to that rate which was thought by the committee to be a fair and just tax upon these corporations. The majority of the committee, after the most considerate deliberation of the subject, have recommended to the Senate that, in their judgment, one-fourth of 1 per cent is a fair tax. In addition to that, we all know that one-fourth of 1 per cent is a far greater tax upon these corporations than a 2 per cent tax upon their net receipts, as was provided in the bill of 1894. When a corporation pays taxes only upon the net receipts, it is a tax upon profit, you may really say. But now it is to make no difference whether there is a deficit between expenditures and receipts, the gross receipts of all corporations over $250,000 shall have to pay one-half of 1 per cent. I think that is too severe a burden upon the corporations, and I agree with the committee that we ought to impose a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. I understood the Senator from Maryland—he will correct me if I misunderstood him—that his proposition was to impose this tax of one-half of 1 per cent and to release the corporations from certain other taxes which are provided in the way of taxing their business.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from Maryland said that he was in favor of striking out, in fact, most of the stamp taxes; but whether that will be carried in the Senate is another question. Whether a majority of the Senate will concur with the Senator from Maryland upon that subject has not been tested, nor have we any evidence of the sentiment of this body on the question.

Mr. RAWLINS. Does not the Senator think that that must affect the question?

Mr. FAULKNER. No; I do not think it affects the question under consideration, because the taxes imposed by stamps will be paid by the parties who are transacting the business of the corporations and not by the corporations themselves. There is no question about that. If the corporation has to put four stamps on a package of freight, one on the receipt and one on each of the waybills, they will all be added in the freight. The citizen will have to pay that tax at last. It will not be paid by the corporation.

But this is a direct tax upon the corporations, and the only question to be determined by the Senate is whether it is a fair and just tax. If it is a fair and just tax, the corporations ought to be required to pay it. I assume that the committee in their examination of this question did not look simply at the aggregate amount of taxes to be raised from all sources by the bill in fixing and determining what was a just and fair tax, but they determined what would be a fair and just tax from all of the considerations bearing upon the tax to be laid upon each particular subject. I simply desire to make the amendment of the Senator from Maryland accord with the views of the committee, who recommend a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent upon gross receipts.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I regret that the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland was not limited to striking out all on pages 59 and 60 and, except the bank provisions on page 61, down to line 4 on page 62. There were two separate propositions as they came from the Committee on Finance. One was to levy a tax on certain corporations, which were named. The second was to levy a tax on all corporations. The provisions were distinct and embraced two different things.

I should be perfectly willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from Maryland as a substitute for the first provision. I should be glad to do that; but I do think the proposition of the committee to levy a tax on corporations as such, as proposed in the second section that is not numbered, ought to be retained in the bill.

While I sympathize with the proposition of the Senator from Maryland to limit the application of these taxes to corporations of larger character, to release from them the corporations having but a limited gross income, I think the amendment goes too far in proposing to release all corporations except those named. I do not know very well how the purpose that I would like to carry out could be brought about.

The Senator from Maryland insists on offering his amendment as a substitute for both the provisions, striking both the provisions out. If we agree to do that, it seems to me that the rate of one-half of 1 per cent proposed by him is very reasonable and that nobody ought to object to the rate. The taxes imposed during the war upon exactly that class of cases was 3 per cent, six times as much as is now proposed by the Senator from Maryland. Later it was 2½ per cent, five times as much as is proposed by him and ten times as much as was proposed by the committee. I was willing to have the tax brought down to one-quarter of 1 per cent in the committee, making it one-tenth only of the tax levied during the war, if we were to include all corporations engaged in business.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Arkansas will recognize the fact that we never taxed the gross receipts of all corporations, even during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is true, but I see no reason why it should not be done. I am one of those who believe that the burdens of taxation ought to rest evenly on all classes of people alike, as far as it is possible to do it. I believe that a just and equitable way of levying taxes would be to levy these taxes upon everything and upon everybody. But we all understand the limitations that the Supreme Court has put on the power of Congress to levy these taxes. We know perfectly well that if we undertake to levy taxes as we believe they ought to be levied, the Supreme Court will probably hold that we have no authority to do it, and we shall get no taxes at all. So it is absolutely necessary for us to keep within the limit as far as we can, and when we have the authority undisputed by all to levy taxes upon these corporations by name, I believe it is right and proper and just that the taxes should be levied upon other corporations as well.

I should be glad to include in this bill everybody engaged in doing business in the same way, if we could do it, and let this burden bear equally on everybody. But that we can not do, as we know. Then we must do the best we can. I should very much prefer to levy these taxes upon, first, the corporations named by the Senator from Maryland at the rate of one-quarter of 1 per cent, and then levy the same tax upon all other corporations doing business amounting to less than a specified sum. But if we can not do that, if we have not the power to do that, and if we limit it to the limited number of corporations mentioned by the Senator from Maryland, certainly one-half of 1 per cent is not an unreasonable tax, and it will not bring a very large amount of revenue.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the amendment was framed by me on the line of the revenue laws passed in 1862 and 1866, when a very much larger amount of money was to be raised for the Treasury than is required on this occasion. There was found no difficulty whatever by the framers of these laws in that great emergency to make a specific levy on gross receipts. I read section 103 of the act of 1864:

SEC. 103. And be it further enacted, That every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing, or having the care or management of any railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel, or any stage coach or other vehicle engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or property for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, or any canal, the water of which is used for mining purposes, shall be subject to and pay a duty of 24 per cent upon the gross receipts of such railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel, or such stage coach or other vehicle.

In addition to that provision, railroad companies, canal companies, and corporations which by their charters—and that is the distinction—practically have a monopoly of trade, and where persons living within the lines of their operations are compelled to use them, were to pay the gross-receipts tax, and, in addition to the gross-receipts tax, they were compelled to pay 5 per cent upon every dividend they made either to the stockholder or the bondholder, and that amount was deducted when they paid the coupon, whether or not the owner of the bond was a resident of this country.

That rule was a wise one, in my judgment. It applied to corporations which had great privileges conferred upon them by legislation either of the States or of Congress. It was not an onerous tax upon them at that time, and not so considered. No question was raised as to the legality of it, and no question whatever was raised as to the exemption. While the amount exempted under the provisions of the amendment which I have proposed is greater than it was in the former acts, yet the principle is identically the same.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will ask the Senator whether this is an exemption of an amount or an exemption of certain classes of corporations? I understand, if the Senator will pardon me, what this means is, that if the gross receipts of a corporation are equal to $250,000, then all the receipts of that corporation are to be taxed. If the gross receipts are under $250,000, then the law is that none of the receipts of that corporation are to be taxed.

Mr. GORMAN. That is unquestionably so. It is not intended that any corporation under the provisions of this law shall be taxed unless the gross receipts reach the amount of $250,000.

Mr. LINDSAY. Then, what receipts are to be taxed?

Mr. GORMAN. If the receipts exceed $250,000, then the entire receipts would be taxed.

Mr. CAFFERY. That is upon the class of corporations mentioned in your amendment?

Mr. GORMAN. All the corporations enumerated in the amendment, and none others.

I placed the exemption at that rate for a reason which to me is entirely satisfactory. Since 1870, when the revenue law was repealed, the whole business affairs of the country have changed in their operation, corporations have been encouraged by State and by national legislation, so that an immense amount of business which was formerly conducted by individuals, by cooperation, and by partnerships is now done in the form of corporations.

Take the case presented by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY], to which I alluded yesterday. Under the provisions of this bill all sugar refineries whose receipts exceed $250,000 per annum shall pay the gross-receipts tax. It would be manifestly unjust to tax the gross receipts of a farmer or a combination of two or three planters or farmers in Louisiana whose receipts would reach that amount. So with other businesses all over this country. You will possibly destroy, or, if not destroy, you would at least embarrass the small corporations who have no special privileges conferred upon them by law.

It would have another tendency, which I want to avoid, which has been growing at a pace that is alarming. If the whole system of taxation were made absolutely uniform, when you place a tax upon each dollar accumulated or made, it would have a tendency to drive the small concerns into consolidation. That is what is threatening the country now, and it is growing largely out of our revenue laws. It would force small capital into large combinations. Take the small railroads. Nearly all the small railroads of the country are being consolidated and absorbed by the great lines; the old neighborhood railroads, which were feeders to the great lines, are no longer independent. I want the exemption large enough to exempt all of that class, so as to permit them to pursue their vocation.

Mr. LINDSAY. If the Senator will pardon me, I ask him whether he thinks that we can exempt altogether from taxation a corporation earning less than $250,000, and make no exemption at all in favor of a corporation earning over $250,000? In other words, is not that making a distinction between two corporations engaged in identically the same business? Would it not be better to exempt $250,000 from all corporations out of their gross earnings, and thereby save the small corporations without making any onerous distinction?

Mr. GORMAN. I would not have any serious objection to that if there is any force, and there may be—for I have great consideration for the opinion of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, who is a lawyer—if there be anything in that question which would embarrass the matter if it ever came to a test, I should be perfectly willing to do it; but the amount would be insignificant, and it would make the tax in that respect uniform. I beg, however, to call the attention of the Senator, and also of the Senators in charge of this bill, to the fact that there is no such thing as uniformity in any taxation to be levied under this bill. There is no such thing as uniformity in any tax law to be found upon the statute book. In the case of manufacturers of tobacco, no matter what their receipts may be, no matter what their business may be, you compel them to pay a license tax to pursue that business.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator's amendment, as I understand it, changes the rate of taxation from one-fourth of 1 per cent to one-half of 1 per cent?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. And it leaves off certain other taxes, as I believe. I should like to have the Senator, aside from the question of the rate of taxation, explain the exact difference, as briefly as he may, between the amendment reported by the committee and that offered by himself as a substitute for certain portions of the Senate amendment now in the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I will do so with great pleasure. The Senator will find amendment No. 177, on page 59 of the bill, which was proposed by the majority of the Committee on Finance, reads:

That from and after the passage of this act every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing, or having the care or management of, any railroad, street railroad, sleeping car, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel, or any stage coach or other vehicle, except hacks or carriages not running on continuous routes, engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or freight for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, shall be subject to and pay a special annual excise tax equivalent to one-fourth of 1 per cent of the gross receipts, etc.

Then he will find on page 60 this provision:

That any person, firm, company, or corporation carrying on or doing an express business shall be subject to and pay a special annual excise tax equivalent to one-fourth of 1 per cent on the gross amount of all the receipts from such express business.

That is included in my amendment.

Following that he will see a provision covering "any person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing, or having the care or management of, any telegraphic or telephone line." That is also included in my amendment, the committee, however, making the rate of taxation one-fourth of 1 per cent. Then on page 62 will be found the section referred to by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator's amendment, as I understand it, goes on to the end of line 9, on page 61, and then drops out the lines between 10 and 16?

Mr. GORMAN. It does. The clause from line 10 to line 16, on page 61, is in reference to the tax on banks, which I prefer the Senate should deal with separately.

Mr. CULLOM. Then the Senator proposes to strike out to the end of line 24, on page 62?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; which provision, commencing in line 5, on page 62, places a tax upon every corporation in the United States, no matter of what character. The object of my amendment is principally to strike out that provision, not to attempt to tax the small corporations engaged in ordinary trade.

Mr. CULLOM. Such as merchants?

Mr. GORMAN. Take an illustration in this city, or in any city, where there may be a partnership on one side of a street, doing exactly the same business, selling calicoes, or goods, or what not, alongside of a small corporation engaged in the same trade, which is in competition with its neighbor. It would be unfair to tax one and to exempt the other. But that class of corporations get no special benefits from their charter or from the legislation either of the State or of the General Government. They are engaged in trade, and the competition is sharp enough to prevent them from making any very extraordinary amount of money. Therefore by this amendment I confine the tax to such great corporations as have received special privileges, and have, in fact, a monopoly of the trade in their own vicinity.

As to the matter of returns alluded to by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], I only want to say that under the provisions of this law every corporation subject to it will be compelled to make returns every month to the collector of internal revenue; and if they make a false or fraudulent return, they will be subject to a penalty of from one to ten thousand dollars, as may be decreed by the collector or by the court.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I understood the honorable Senator from Maryland to state that if a party made a false or fraudulent return he would be subjected to a fine of $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. TURPIE. But I call the honorable Senator's attention to the fact that if a party makes a false or fraudulent return he is liable to the pains and penalties of perjury. I am perfectly satisfied that that is a good sanction. But if he fails to make any return at all, then the fine comes in. I do not think that is a good sanction. I think the effect of that will be that in certain cases there will be no returns, and they will pay the fine.

Mr. GORMAN. I adopted that provision from the old law, and while we all have very great respect for the Senator's judgment, I have greater respect for the actual operations of a great measure of this kind, one which has passed the test of six or seven years, under which we never had any difficulty, and where the matter of imprisonment was unknown in cases of this sort; where nobody, so far as I know, has ever claimed that the imposition of a fine was not sufficient in any one of these cases. If you take the acts of 1862 and 1870 you will find that there are but three cases prescribed in which you could convict a person and send him to the penitentiary for refusing or failing to make a fair return, and a fine was the remedy.

I call the attention of the Senator to this part of the section:

Any person failing or refusing to make return as aforesaid, or who shall make a false or fraudulent return, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000 for each and every false or fraudulent return.

I ask the Senator if, under the provisions of this law, there is a single case of any corporation in the United States where the tax of even one-half of 1 per cent would exceed $10,000 a month? I know of none such. But you would recover not only the fine, but the amount which should have been returned. If they fail or refuse, or if they make a false or fraudulent return, then a penalty of from $1,000 to $10,000 may be imposed. I think Senators will find that that is a greater fine than was imposed under any section of the old internal-revenue law. I do not want to see in this year 1898 any such penalty as is proposed to be inflicted for the mere failure to perform a duty in the payment of a tax which would go into the Treasury of the United States. It is unnecessary. I do not believe in imposing unusual and severe penalties in these cases.

As to rates, I have no desire, as I said yesterday, to impose a greater rate upon these corporations than is fair, just, and right. I know the great pressure that has been brought to bear on all of us; it comes to me, as the Senator from California has said it did to him, with great force from all the people connected with these corporations, some of whom are valued personal friends of mine; but we should do nothing to unreasonably embarrass these corporations. I do not want to embarrass them or to impose a tax upon them that is too great and out of proportion.

I should like to see a fair tax imposed; but I say the corporations in the United States and all their friends are making a great mistake against the interests of the corporations themselves in trying to secure exemption entirely from this war tax, refusing to pay their proportion, or trying to have the law so framed that they shall not bear a fair proportion of the great burden which will be imposed by the war upon the American people. Those corporations are protected by this Government with all its majesty. They are protected by its Army, and its officers are used to give them facilities entirely different from those which are used, and to a greater extent than that which is required to be employed in protecting the manufacturers of tobacco, or the manufacturers of whisky, or cigars, or any other of the business interests which are affected by this bill.

If one-half of 1 per cent is too great a tax, I am perfectly content that it shall be made one-fourth of 1 per cent. As I said yesterday, the amount which will be raised from this source, I believe, is somewhat of a guess. I believe one-half of 1 per cent on receipts would produce nearly $20,000,000. In the matter of steam railroads we can arrive at the amount almost accurately. The gross receipts of the steam railroads, according to the returns made in 1897, amounted to $1,116,000,000; and the amount will probably be greater during the next two or three years, for all of them have within the last few days increased their rates, and they have increased them, in my judgment, in anticipation not only of the increased business, of which the Government will have to pay for a large share, but also in view of this very legislation which is contemplated of putting a fair tax on them.

They have the power to reconp the amount of the tax from the people, whilst the business man has no such power. So the corporations ought to submit to a fair rate of taxation. In the matter of steam railroads, under the receipts of last year, one-half of 1 per cent would produce to the Government $5,500,000. That is a large tax in itself, it may be said. Two million five hundred thousand dollars would be produced under the suggested amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER]. Telegraph companies, taking their receipts for the last year, would pay about five or six hundred thousand dollars—$300,000 possibly under the amendment proposed. So with street railroads.

Anxious as I am, Mr. President, that we shall have a provision which will levy a fair tax on these great interests, and only a fair tax, I do not object, if that be the opinion of the Senate, to making it one-fourth of 1 per cent, although my personal judgment is that under the exemptions provided one-half of 1 per cent would be a fair tax.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I offered my amendment in time, and I supposed that possibly it might be accepted by the Senator from Maryland. I realize that I can not offer the amendment, as it is an amendment in the third degree, and no such amendment can be offered under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. We can not hear on this side of the Chamber what the Senator from West Virginia is saying.

Mr. FAULKNER. I stated that I had offered the amendment with the hope that the Senator from Maryland would accept it.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the amendment?

Mr. FAULKNER. To reduce the amount of the tax on gross receipts from one-half to one-fourth of 1 per cent; but, under the rules of the Senate, it being an amendment in the third degree, of course it can not be offered to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. My attention was called to that fact by the Vice-President presiding, and I realized the correctness of the ruling. Therefore I shall necessarily have to withdraw the amendment.

But there is an amendment which I will also call to the attention of the Senator from Maryland, and which I hope perhaps he will accept; that is, on page 2, line 6, of his amendment, to strike out the word "receipts" and insert the word "earnings."

The object of that is to make corporations pay taxes only on their own earnings and not on the earnings of other corporations which they collect. For example, here is a connecting line of railroad or a connecting line of railroad and steamers. The charge is collected from the party at the point of shipment on right through to the point of destination. Monthly they settle one with the other; but at the same time the entire amount enters into the gross receipts of that road; and yet it certainly would not be proper to tax those receipts, because in six months they will be turned over to the other company, who would have in turn to turn them in as gross receipts of that company.

Mr. FRYE. That is true of express companies all over the country.

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes; that is true of all transportation companies.

Mr. GORMAN. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this term "gross receipts" has already been judicially determined and determined by the Department. It is the same term; it is the precise provision which is in previous acts on this subject, and in the construction of those acts it has been held that "gross receipts" only meant the amount of the earnings of the road itself, and did not include any amount which it received when acting as a mere collector for a connecting line.

Mr. FAULKNER. Then that shows the importance of using proper phraseology in framing a bill. Why should this be left to construction? I should think that what the Senator has stated would be the true construction of this act by the Department. But why leave it in that way? If that is the construction, why not use plain English language to express that construction? The gross earnings of a company include every dollar that belongs to that company and earned during that month when the returns are made.

Mr. WHITE. I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] that as the other expression, "gross receipts," has received a construction in harmony with the proprieties of the case, I think it unwise to suggest another phrase which, when subjected to examination and interpretation, may perhaps be given a very different turn from that which is now given by the Senator from West Virginia. I very much fear that the expression now suggested is susceptible of another interpretation.

Mr. FAULKNER. To what other interpretation does the Senator suppose it would be subject?

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I think there can be no difficulty at all as to the settlements which the various corporations must make with each other. The proper balances will be struck and the proper amounts will be given to the Government, and each corporation will necessarily have before it the amounts paid to those with whom it deals. I do not think that there will ever be a dollar lost to the Government or a dollar of burden put upon any one particular corporation. I am afraid there may be an unexpected construction placed upon this word "earnings," which may extend it to profits. This may be doubtful, but I do not desire to take chances and prefer words definitely construed.

While that might be a liberal interpretation, yet as long as the word "receipts" has been given a meaning by the Department I believe we ought to adhere to the expression contained in the old law, and that it will certainly be taken as the basis for the construction of the gross-receipts tax.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not see how, with the word "gross" qualifying the word "earnings," there can be any misconstruction of the meaning or any misinterpretation of that language.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me to call his attention to the fact, his proposition is made almost irrefragable as to the distinction between gross earnings and net earnings.

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course.

Mr. SPOONER. Nobody has ever held that "gross receipts" were profits. There are receipts which are not earnings at all.

Mr. FAULKNER. I can not offer the amendment now, but I have simply suggested it to the Senator from Maryland, knowing that it is not in order.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that the phraseology is "receipts of such persons." If I say that a certain amount of money is a receipt of the Senator from Wisconsin, the ordinary meaning attached to it is that given by the Department that it is his.

Mr. SPOONER. That is my impression. That expression "gross receipts," for instance, of a corporation which is earning money in the exercise of its franchise will probably be construed to include only the moneys which were earned by that company in the exercise of its franchise; but the phrase is largely, I think, a matter of construction. Certainly, as a matter of the plainest sort of justice, moneys which have been earned by some other carrier, if you please, which went in the ordinary transaction of business into another carrier as an ordinary trust fund, would not be included in the phrase "gross receipts," and such is the construction.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, it is not my purpose or desire to delay the passage of this bill for one moment. I have been misunderstood if it has been so inferred. It is true I said a few days ago, in reply to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] asking that we fix a time for a vote, that I did not believe we could vote to-day and do justice to the grave questions which are involved in this bill. I stated also that there was no emergency upon us, but, on the contrary, a hopeful prospect, which might perhaps obviate the necessity of some portions of the bill.

The favor which I give to the gross-receipts tax on corporations is not actuated by any prejudice against corporations. I only desire that they contribute their just and fair portion to the public purse, and I believe in the long run it will be to their interests, as well as to the general public interest, that they do so. By a gross-receipts tax, which is easily collected from those who have money in hand, there will be obviated, in degrees more or less onerous to nearly all the persons, firms, and corporations named in this bill, small and pestiferous taxes on varying features of their business. The stamp tax would be made more tolerable at least.

I have listened to the objections made to the gross-receipts tax on corporations. I regret that they have been placed on legal grounds affecting their constitutionality. Whatever may be the policy of the law in this respect is an open question upon which gentlemen may naturally differ. I do not conceive that there can be any weighty doubt as to the constitutionality of these provisions, and I wish to answer some of the objections which were made on those grounds by the citations of authority and the enunciation of principles which I think will set them reasonably at rest.

I have great sympathy with much that has been said by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], and yet I have hesitation in supporting the amendment he has offered, which increases the rate of the tax and lessens the field of its application. The theory upon which the gross-receipts tax has been embodied in this bill is to make a small, diffusive tax, one that, as far as may be, will not operate as an oppression upon any industry; and the very fact that my honorable friend from Maryland, in moving to exempt corporations to the extent of $250,000 of gross receipts, moves at the same time to increase the principal of the tax upon the rest, shows that the author of the amendment feels the necessity of cumulating upon those taxed the amount subtracted from those exempted.

Now, there may be a public policy and a wise one to be subserved in exempting the weak and the struggling corporations of the country, those especially which have a small amount of gross receipts. In my own opinion that may be done without affecting the constitutionality of the tax as a whole. There are many authorities which support this view, and yet we can not be oblivious to the fact that there have been intimations in judicial opinions which throw some shadow of doubt upon that question, and the object of the measure as at present was to steer as clear as possible of judicial objections which might possibly be made.

In the income-tax laws which have heretofore been enacted by Congress all of them have contained exemptions, and it has been said by that great commentator upon our Constitution, Judge Cooley, that the power to tax is the power to exempt, exemptions from taxation, especially with relation to customs duties and excises, being regulated by large considerations of public policy. Congress gets its power to lay these taxes from section 8 of the first article of the Constitution, which says:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Now, then, our customs or impost duties, commonly called the tariff, have many exemptions, exemptions of classes and exemptions and diversifications of the methods and amounts of levying taxes in almost every conceivable direction, and yet all tariff laws are just as much under the direction of the Constitution which requires that they shall be uniform as an internal-revenue excise law.

We can not offer amendments to the proposition of the Senator from Maryland. It seems that it is in the last degree in which an amendment is admissible to the bill. I wish that it might be temporarily passed by that perhaps we might fashion it in such shape as to be acceptable to the Senate. In its present shape it seems to me it would scarcely be advisable to adopt it.

Mr. President, in reference to the authorities which have been quoted to us and the views presented by the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] and the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], I wish to call attention to some decisions of the Supreme Court. It must be remembered, as Chief Justice Marshall reminded us in construing the Constitution, that it is a constitution which is to be construed. It is also to be remembered that it is the Constitution of a nation having direction of the vast Federal affairs of a cluster of forty-five States.

It must, therefore, in the very nature of things, have broader, deeper, and more comprehensive principles to subserve than the constitution of any specific State, which is but a part of a mighty whole. The Supreme Court has frequently called attention to the almost all-embracing power of the Federal Congress with respect to taxation, and we are reminded by it in the case of the Pacific Insurance Company vs. Soule, reported in 7 Wallace, 448 that—

The taxing power is given in the most comprehensive terms. The only limitations enforced are that direct taxes, including the capitation tax, shall be apportioned, that duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform, and that no duties shall be imposed upon articles exported from the States. With these exceptions, the power to tax is in all respects unfettered.

This was said as to the express provisions of the Constitution. There is one other limitation necessarily implied by the very nature of our Federal system of Government embracing States out of which is molded a whole, and that is that no State can tax the instrumentalities of the Federal Government and, e converso, that the Federal Government can not tax the instrumentalities of a State.

There has been suggested to us by the honorable Senator from Connecticut another limitation which he draws from the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, which says:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

I think, without disrespect to the argument of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, I may remind the Senate that this is a limitation solely upon the powers of the State, that it is inapplicable to any Federal tax bill, that it has no part in our Federal jurisprudence as applied by Congress to tax bills. It calls our attention also to the fact which it does not seem to me the honorable Senator from Kentucky sufficiently regarded, that there are powers in the Federal Government which do not belong to the States.

This tax bill does not in any respect interfere with the instrumentalities of any State. The taxes laid in this bill are upon business corporations. They do not touch anywhere the prerogative of any Commonwealth. So it can not be said that this is a direct tax. It has been decided over and over and over again by the Supreme Court of the United States that it has nothing in its nature of a direct tax, and while gentlemen summon up the income-tax decision occasionally as an objection to this tax on business measured by gross receipts, I must remind those gentlemen that there is nothing in this excise tax that partakes of the nature of an income tax.

The income tax was not levied upon the income of business. It was levied upon any income, however derived. An old man, blind and paralyzed, having no business whatsoever, had his income as a concrete thing taxed, and the Supreme Court, overruling many authorities, held that to be a direct tax. But there is no direct line anywhere in this bill between the taxing power and an income. It is simply a tax upon business. It is simply a tax upon business done for profit, and that the tax is measured by the income, or by the dividends, or by the net receipts, or by the gross receipts is a mere artificial standard adopted, which does not put the tax on that income, dividend, or receipt, but puts the tax on the person who receives it, and collects the tax from him indifferently from any portion of his property.

Mr. President, there are at least three cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in which that tribunal has held valid taxes levied upon State corporations, cases in which the question was presented in the sharpest form. That tribunal has set at rest the doctrine for which I contend upholding Federal excise taxes upon State railroads, banks, insurance companies, canals, and turnpikes, not, indeed, upon their rights to be such corporations, but upon the business done by them for profit, and assessed according to their dividends and profits in the case of railroads, canals, and turnpikes, according to their circulation in the case of banks, and according to the gross amount of their premiums, their dividends, and their income in the case of insurance companies.

Let me quote the language of Chief Justice Chase in the case of Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, 8 Wallace, 547:

A railroad company in the exercise of its corporate franchises issues freight receipts, bills of lading, and passenger tickets; and it can not be doubted that the organization of railroads is quite as important to the State as the organization of banks. But it will hardly be questioned that these contracts of the company are objects of taxation within the power of Congress and not exempted by any relation to the State which granted the charter of the railroad. And it seems difficult to distinguish the taxation of notes issued for circulation from the taxation of these railroad contracts.

Both descriptions of contracts are means of profit to the corporation which issues them, and both, as we think, may properly be made contributory to the public revenue.

Here, then, was a case in which the Veazie Bank, a corporation chartered by the State of Maine, was taxed upon the exercise of its franchise to issue notes, a thing done for profit, an ordinary and not a prerogative tax, as the Supreme Court held; and why may we not tax a bank or a railroad chartered by a State upon any one of its ordinary franchises? And if we tax the ordinary franchise of any State corporation which is thus settled with respect to railroads and banks, it is for Congress alone to decide what the amount of the tax may be and to measure the amount in any way it may determine; for be it remembered that the power to tax is solely with Congress, and hence the measure and amount of the tax must rest with it also. As Chief Justice Chase said in that case:

The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility of the legislature is not to the courts but to the people by whom its members are elected. So if a particular tax bears heavily upon a corporation or a class of corporations, it can not for that reason only be pronounced contrary to the Constitution.

The object of the framers of this amendment has been to make the tax bear not oppressively but lightly upon all.

In the case of Pacific Insurance Company vs. Soule (7 Wall., 434) the court held that an income tax or duties laid by the act of June 30, 1864, upon the amounts insured, renewed, or continued by insurance companies upon the gross amounts of premiums secured and assessments made by them, and also upon dividends, undistributed sums, and incomes as not a direct tax, but a duty or excise, the court saying:

If a tax upon carriages kept for his own use by the owner is not a direct tax, we can see no ground upon which a tax on the business of an insurance company can belong to that class of revenue charges.

Here I desire to call attention to the distinction between this case and the more recent income-tax decisions of the United States Supreme Court rendered in 1894. There is no contradiction of the one by the other. They are perfectly consistent with each other. A tax upon the business of an insurance company measured by its income is valid. A tax directly upon the income was recently held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be invalid. There is one other case which runs right along upon the same line, and this was a case which did not tax individuals like corporations.

Gentlemen here have contended that if you tax a corporation you must tax an individual doing the same business in exactly the same way, and they have urged that not to do so is to conflict with the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution of the United States requires that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." These gentlemen generally stop with the word "uniform." They do not use the rest of the expression, which shows the kind of uniformity which the Constitution has reference to. The taxes laid in this bill are perfectly uniform throughout the United States, just as the taxes laid by the tariff act are uniform throughout the United States. Uniformity between the parties was not in view of the Constitution, because we tax one class of persons by one standard and another class by another standard throughout the tariff law and throughout all internal-revenue law. In the Head-Money cases (112 U. S., 594), Justice Matthews, giving the opinion of the Supreme Court, quoted the Constitution and said:

The uniformity here prescribed has reference to the various localities in which the tax is intended to operate. "It shall be uniform throughout the United States." Is the tax on tobacco void because in many of the States no tobacco is raised or manufactured? Is the tax on distilled spirits void because a few States pay three-fourths of the revenue arising from it?

The tax is uniform when it operates with the same force and effect in every place where the subject of it is found.

Great considerations of public policy are the only ones that can be taken into view in pointing out the objects of taxation.

In the case of Railroad vs. Collector (100 U. S., 598) we had the case of a provision of law which laid taxes on any railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation, or slack-water company indebted for any money for which bonds or other evidence of debt had been issued. Here was a specific class of corporations taxed. Here were specific kinds of business taxed when conducted by corporations which were not taxed when conducted by individuals in the same way. The Supreme Court held this entirely valid, and one of the most eminent judges who has ever sat upon the Supreme Court bench, Judge Miller, in giving the decision uttered an opinion which, I think, may be read with profit by all who object to this excise tax on corporations.

In that case the clause of the act or statute under consideration reads as follows:

Any railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation, or slack-water company indebted for any money for which bonds or other evidence of indebtedness have been issued, payable in one or more years after date, upon which interest is stipulated to be paid, or coupons representing the interest, or any such company that may have declared any dividend in scrip or money due or payable to its stockholders, including nonresidents, whether citizens or aliens, as part of the earnings, profits, income, or gains of such company, and all profits of such company carried to the account of any fund or used for construction, shall be subject to and pay a tax of 5 per cent on the amount of all such interest or coupons, dividends, or profits, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable and to whatsoever party or person the same may be payable, including nonresidents, whether citizens or aliens; and said companies are hereby authorized to deduct and withhold from all payments on account of any interest or coupons and dividends, due and payable as aforesaid, the tax of 5 per cent; and the payment of the amount of said tax so deducted from the interest or coupons or dividends and certified by the president or treasurer of said company shall discharge said company from that amount of the dividend or interest or coupon on the bonds or other evidences of their indebtedness so held by any person or party whatever, except where said companies have contracted otherwise. (14 Stat., 123.)

The Supreme Court said:

The tax, in our opinion, is essentially an excise on the business of the class of corporations mentioned in the statute. The section is a part of the system of taxing incomes, earnings, and profits adopted during the late war and abandoned as soon after that war was ended as it could be done safely. The corporations mentioned in this section are those engaged in furnishing roads, canals, and waterways for the transportation of persons and property, and the manifest purpose of the law was to levy the tax on the net earnings of such companies. How were these "earnings, profits, income, or gains" to be most certainly ascertained? In every well-conducted corporation of this character these profits were disposed of in one of four methods, namely: Distributed to its stockholders as dividends, used in the construction of its roads or canals, paid out for interest on its funded debts, or carried to a reserve or other fund remaining in its hands. Looking to these modes of distribution as the surest evidence of the earnings which Congress intended to tax and as less liable to evasion than any other, the tax is imposed upon all of them. The books and records of the company are thus made evidence of the profits they have made, and the corporation itself is made responsible for the payment of the tax.

Manifestly such a mode of ascertaining the net earnings of the company would not be complete unless the sums paid as interest on their bonded debts were taken into account.

Of course it was competent for Congress to tax only the earnings after deducting this interest paid on their debt, or to treat the sum so paid as part of the net earnings and paid out of them as dividends were. It adopted the latter policy.

It is said sometimes, Mr. President, that this is a franchise tax, and that we can not tax any franchise which is given by the legislature of a State. There are two kinds of franchises granted by the legislatures of States. They are prerogative franchises and ordinary franchises.

A prerogative franchise is one in which the State confers a portion of its sovereign power as a State upon the corporation, and delegates it as agent to execute that sovereign power. Other franchises or ordinary franchises are those to conduct certain lines of business for its own profit. Now, in so far as a corporation may be an instrumentality of a State, performing a function which only a State as a government can perform, we can not put a specific tax on its right to exercise that function. But the great majority of corporations in the modern age are simply limited partnerships in the guise of corporations. The great majority of them are not the recipients of the delegated sovereignty of the State. So far as they are concerned there is no difficulty as to this question.

We are sometimes misled and even judges are often misled by shorthand expressions. The tax in this bill is sometimes spoken of as a tax on gross receipts. That is an inaccurate method of stating it. It is a tax on the business done by a corporation measured by gross receipts. So in speaking of it as a tax on franchises the courts and Senators and members of the House of Representatives, by calling it a franchise tax, or a tax on the franchise, may sometimes mislead, for while it goes to the business which is conducted under the franchise, we should follow the tax with a discriminating eye and observe that it is not in fact levied upon the franchise or charter. When we speak of it as a tax on the franchise, instead of speaking according to the accuracy with which we should measure our words in the discernment of delicate powers, we are rather using a shorthand expression which does not convey the precise idea upon which these taxes are levied.

That I am correct in this will be seen by a critical view of some of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, as well as by a clear analysis of the various provisions.

What is a franchise, Mr. President? Let us answer that question first. Kent, in his Commentaries, uses the word "franchise" as synonymous with the word "corporation." Sometimes the term is used as the synonym of the charter of the corporation.

If we use the word in the sense that Kent used it, and if the views of the honorable Senator from Kentucky are correct, we might find ourselves in such a situation that we could not tax any corporation chartered by a State, and the whole country could remove its property and its business from the power of the Federal Government to reach it by getting a legislature to give it a franchise such as the honorable Senator from Kentucky speaks of. "Franchise" or "franchises" is often used in other senses as applied to the power or powers conferred upon the corporation. A single corporation may have many franchises, just as an individual may have many attributes and relations.

A State judge can not be taxed on his salary. That is essential to the integrity and autonomy of the State, but if the State judge is also a grocer, if he is also a practitioner of law, if he is a farmer, or if he is a hundred other things which men of affairs are in business, he may be taxed, although he is a State judge, on every species of his property and on the exercise of every function except that of being a judge. So when a corporation is chartered by a State and when it is chartered by the Federal Government, it does not relieve the State corporation from its obligation to pay taxes to the Federal Government, and neither does it relieve a corporation chartered by the Federal Government from its obligations to pay taxes to a State. It simply relieves the corporation chartered by the State from having a tax put upon its right to perform the duty assigned to it by the State, and in turn it simply relieves the corporation which is chartered by the Federal Government to execute a portion of its sovereignty from having a tax put upon the exercise of that franchise.

All the property of the corporation, all functions of the corporation, all business of the corporation outside of the exercise of this specific State function with respect to Federal taxation and outside of each specific Federal function with respect to State taxation, remain taxable by the Federal Government and by the State.

The special excise tax in this bill upon corporations measured by gross receipts may be described as a tax on peculiar aggregations of men, bearing an aggregate name, invested with peculiar aggregate and artificial personality, doing business for profit, and with certain limited liabilities created by law for their own benefit, and this tax is measured by the gross receipts of the aggregation.

It is said that corporations are persons. So they are, Mr. President, persons, entities, things, but they are not human beings of any race or of any color. When it is said that they are persons it is not meant to assert a fact. It is simply meant to introduce an analogy, and to create them persons only in certain limited respects. They are persons in the sense that they may have a legal local habitation; they are persons in the sense that they may bear a name; they are persons in the sense that they may sue and be sued; they are persons in the sense that they may have perpetual succession, and yet perpetual succession has been given to no human person by his Creator, and can not be imparted to any human person by law.

Neither are they persons with respect to the duties and obligations which they owe to the Government, except in a limited way. They can not, therefore, be persons in the sense of the duties and obligations that government owes to them, except in a limited way, for otherwise there would be no reciprocity in the relation. They can not bear arms and fight for the country. They can not expose themselves to the danger of Spanish bullets or the swamp or malarial or yellow fever; and even if they could, Mr. President, they could not sing a song about the girl they left behind them, for it does not belong to corporations to have the instincts or the relations which belong to human beings. They can not marry and be given in marriage; they have no cradles to rock at home; they have no wife and children to provide for.

Would any of these honorable Senators who contend upon this floor that corporations are to be regarded as human beings and treated as such throughout our law of taxation think it unconstitutional to exempt the householder and head of a family from the levy upon his cabin, or a poor man from having his cow and horse, his cradle and kitchen furniture, and his hoe and hammer levied upon, and declare that the act was not constitutional because we had not exempted the houses or horses or cradles or hoes or hammers or furniture of corporations from levy likewise?

"Thou shalt have none other gods but Me" is the great text of the divine law. Neither can we have upon this earth other human beings than those which He hath created. So in our laws, Mr. President, we are obliged from the nature of things to recognize a difference between God-made things and mere human fabrications. We may tax artificial flowers one way in a tariff bill, or the sale of them in one way by an internal-revenue bill. It does not follow that we are obliged to follow and tax in the same way the flowers with which nature has clothed the garden. They are different things. In our internal-revenue laws we tax artificial butter one way, but we stop when we get to the milk churn of the farmer's wife, or to the table where there is genuine natural butter, and so we do not tax that. All through tariff bills, and all through internal-revenue bills, the law as made does to-day make, and wise laws must forever make, the discriminations which the God of nature has Himself made.

It has never been contended in Congress before this debate, so far as my limited reading of the legislative records discloses, that the Federal Government can not tax corporations chartered by a State. It is quite evident to my mind that when the States create them artificial persons and authorize them to conduct business in a particular way, it makes them subject to taxation, State and national, upon the particular way in which that business is conducted. The fact that we may tax corporations of States is conceded by the authors of this bill. They are well aware of it, for throughout the bill they tax State corporations in all its provisions just as they tax persons, which they could not do if they were part of the autonomy of a State or instruments employed by it in the execution of its powers.

The United States Supreme Court held, in the case of Santa Clara County against The Southern Pacific Railroad, in 118 United States Reports, 394, that an assessment by the State collector upon the Southern Pacific Railroad franchise was invalid, but that a tax on its property was valid. In California vs. Pacific Railroad Company (127 U. S., 26) it was held to the like effect.

In the case of the Railroad Company vs. Peniston (in 18 Wallace, page 6) it appears that the Union Pacific Railroad Company had been chartered by Congress to construct a railroad and telegraph line from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; and the county of Lincoln, in the State of Nebraska, levied a tax upon the property of the company, valuing it at $16,000 per mile for 170 miles. The tax of the county as thus assessed derived $41,328 from the railroad company and only $6,350.45 from other people's property. The Hon. William M. Everts, for the company as its attorney, opposed the tax in arguments of which the observations of Senators in this debate sound like echoes, but they made no impression upon the Supreme Court of the United States.

Judge Strong gave its opinion and sustained the tax. He pointed out what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and, it seems to me, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] have either denied or have suggested the contrary, that a railroad is a "private corporation"—that is to say, a railroad company chartered by the Government of the United States to execute certain governmental functions is a "private corporation," not a public corporation, "though existing for the performance of public duties."

That is what I have contended, Mr. President, all along. The Supreme Court said that this Federal railroad "was a public agent; so were steamboats, horses, stagecoaches, foundries, shipyards, and multitudes of manufacturing establishments." Judge Strong declared that if the railroad chartered by the Federal Government were "exempt from liability to contribute to the revenue of the States, it is manifest that the State governments would be paralyzed."

Now, what is the contention of my honorable friend from Kentucky, who advocates State rights Democracy and intimates that some upon this floor are not hewing to the line of State independence. What does he advocate? Why, that the Federal Government can not tax a State charter, and correspondingly, that a State can not tax a Federal charter. Here is the answer of the Supreme Court, which says that if it were to hold that the States can not tax railroad companies because chartered by the Federal Government and require them to contribute to Government, it is manifest that the State governments would be paralyzed. I do not want to see the State governments paralyzed. I assert the power of the State sovereign to tax within its jurisdiction and up to the point where it comes to interference with the exercise of a Federal power. There its right falls.

So, upon the other hand, Mr. President, I do not want to see the arm of this great National Union Government paralyzed. When it goes down into the State, as it has a right to do, we can only cry "halt" to it when it lays its taxing hand upon that faculty of the State corporation which has been invested with the sovereign power of the State to execute some specific act of its sovereign will.

The tax—

is not imposed upon the franchisees or the right of the company to exist and perform the functions for which it was brought into being. Nor is it laid upon any act which the company has been authorized to do.

That is the Federal railroad; and, giving a true principle for our guidance, he held that—

Exemption of Federal agencies from State taxation is dependent not upon the nature of the agents, or upon the mode of their constitution, or upon the fact that they are agents, but upon the effect of the tax; that is, upon the question, Does it in truth deprive them of power to serve the Government as it was intended to serve it, or does it hinder the efficient exercise of their power?

Now, then, if we prescribe for Congress the limitations upon its powers to tax State corporations, the principles laid down by the Supreme Court as limitations upon the power of the States to tax Federal corporations, if we give equal dignity in their respective spheres to both State and National governments, as my honored friend the Senator from Kentucky contended, and as I readily concur, what is there to comfort or to strengthen his position against taxation of State corporations in their business matters conducted for their own profit?

I may well say of this Federal tax on business corporations chartered by a State, concurring with the views of the Supreme Court with respect to State taxation upon Federal corporations, that the tax on this business, generally for profit, is not laid upon any act which the companies have been authorized to do for the State, and may well apply to it the judicial touchstone, that the effect of the tax is not to deprive these corporations of the power to serve the State government as they may have been intended to serve it, nor does it hinder the efficient exercise of their power.

I might well reply to Senators who are minimizing the power of the Federal Government to tax corporations for its support as Judge Strong did to those who minimized the power of the State to tax railroads chartered by Congress, that if these corporations are exempt from liability to contribute to the revenue of the General Government it is manifest that it would be paralyzed; for I have no sympathy, Mr. President, with those who are by all sorts of "nice, sharp quillots of the law" belittling the power of Congress to tax, and are at the same time trying to plunge it into an enormous public debt, in turn, no doubt, according to their projections, to be paid by taxes on what the people eat and wear and use, and from whom in the future, as in this bill, like exemptions will be urged as are urged now.

I must do my honorable friend the Senator from Kentucky the justice to say and call attention to the fact that he said he was not speaking of business corporations. His argument, as he himself declared, "does not apply to strictly business corporations." If that be so, Mr. President, let me rejoin that all of the corporation taxes in the section of the bill which confines itself to corporations are of that character; that is to say, strictly business corporations. This appears alike from their designation and also from the designation of those excepted from the operation of the tax. The bill, in short, is strictly business. The excise is laid upon corporations doing business in the United States. The exceptions include "religious, educational, benevolent, eleemosynary, or cemetery corporations."

So far, then, as there is any public corporation in this country invested by a State with a portion of its sovereign power to be executed and operated solely for public purposes the Federal Government bows in honor to the integrity and to the autonomy of States, and says, "Not a dime, not a penny, not a mill will I ask from you that interferes with that."

So, Mr. President, the most scrutinizing inspection of this bill will not give warrant to any suggestion from any source that those who believe in the integrity of States and in the integrity of the nation have not shown the utmost respect and reverence to the line of demarcation, for they have left each sovereignty and every sovereignty in its own sphere, on its own throne, with full respect, and in full and unimpeded healthful operation.

Thus, Mr. President, the instrumentalities of State governments are excepted. There is no invasion of State rights, however high the Senator from Kentucky may attempt to build the wall around it and however closely he may try to chink its stone.

My honorable friend says he has been a little surprised to find in this discussion that it is on this side of the Chamber that the powers of the Federal Government have been magnified and the rights and powers of the State government systematically minimized. I disclaim that there is a line in the bill, I disclaim that I have uttered a thought or made a suggestion that does not recognize in all their primal and perennial integrity the perfect autonomy and function of both State and nation.

I am not jealous of the exercise of the powers of this Federal Government in any case in which they ought to be exercised. I believe they ought to be magnified when there is occasion for their use; and in the dread and solemn emergency of war, while we should be cautious and prudent and painstaking not to overstep the bounds of constitutional limit, it is not the time for subtle ingenuity to suggest difficulties in revenue measures, to peruse the briefs of lost causes in the Supreme Court, and thrash over the old straw that has been trodden out by judicial decision to suggest lawsuits and difficulties to people who may not be anxious to pay the tax but anxious to avoid it.

I can invent a nest of lawsuits all through this bill with respect to matters in which my own people are concerned, and others. I have preferred to submit to taxes put upon them without a suggestion of the character which has been made; but of course, sir, if I discerned that any principle was being violated or that my own people were in danger of being unduly oppressed, I would make it known, and appeal to the fair and discriminating judgment of the Senate to correct it.

Neither do I think that my friend's language attributed to my honorable friend and colleague, who is an eminent lawyer from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY], was justified by anything in the speech of that honorable gentleman. He was simply quoting a decision of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of The Bank vs. McCulloch, in which the great Chief Justice showed that there were powers in the Federal Government which relate to States that do not exist in the States with relation to the Federal Government.

I am not afraid to have my Democracy impugned, if that were a question (though it seems to me it is too insignificant a one to be worthy of public mention), by following the luminous decisions of Chief Justice Marshall of the Supreme Court of the United States. Whatever I am and to whatever party any member of the Senate may belong, we are all bound by those decisions. This Government was not created to fit the peculiar notions of any particular individual. It had no political platform before it after which it must be modeled; and those of us who expect to execute its provisions must take the laws and the Constitution as we find them and not as we might prefer them, and we must respect the decisions as rendered and not as we think they should have been made.

There is a wider scope to the powers of this Government, and there are many powers that this Government does possess with respect to the States that the States do not possess with respect to it. It can not charter mere business corporations and provide the manner in which corporations and partnerships can be formed, for those are matters of individual relationship which belong to the State.

But, Mr. President, it has great concerns to conduct with which the States have nothing to do except to execute its will as transmitted to them. It is Congress alone that can declare war, not the legislature of any State. It is Congress alone that can coin money, not the legislature of any State. It is Congress alone that can regulate interstate commerce. No State can even touch it. And it is Congress alone, Mr. President, that can levy taxes, duties, imposts, and excises throughout this Union. No State can, except within its own narrow boundaries and limits.

So, as Congress is intrusted with these great specific powers, the war-making power, the money-making power, the interstate-commerce-regulating power, which no State has even in the most infinitesimal degree, and as Congress must levy its imposts, duties, excises, and taxes according to a broad continental view and not according to the narrow local view of any particular set of men, so Congress must have the power and must exercise the power to carry out that great scheme of continental liberty with fairness to all interests, and with no one suggesting that we are infringing upon the State authority when we tax a State corporation organized to sell boots and shoes or to churn butter, to make cheese or run a street-car line, or to do any one of the many acts which are done every day by grocers upon the street and by the milkmaids in the country.

So, Mr. President, there is a distinct difference between the railroads chartered by the States and the railroads chartered by the Federal Government, arising out of the great comprehensive powers which are granted to Congress. But in this case, holding the balance in an equal and untrembling hand, we simply contend and affirm that, as held by the Supreme Court of the United States in one set of cases, the State government may tax Federal railroads upon their business. So it is equally true, as held in others, that the Federal Government may tax State railroads upon their business and all corporations whatsoever chartered by States except those public corporations which execute solely public functions and which are not organized for individual profit.

Mr. President, concluding on that line, let me observe, in answer to the contention that in taxing corporations we must tax the individual doing the same business, that the Supreme Court has otherwise decided in one of the decisions which I have read. I have felt it due to the dignity of this great pivotal question that I should say something in answer to the learned and intelligent gentlemen who have assailed these provisions upon the ground of their constitutionality. I have much dislike to detain the Senate for a moment.

I believe that the scheme of the Senator from Maryland may be carried out so as at least to lessen the hardships of the lesser corporations, but I greatly question whether or not it would be wise and just, in view of the intimations in the opinions of some of the judges, to make so great an exemption from taxation as $250,000 of corporate wealth; and, in the long run, the fewer people we exempt the more we will diffuse taxes. While there may be cases of individual hardship, it is true in political economy, as it is true in the courts of law, that hard cases frequently make bad laws.

I wish that each class of corporations in this bill might have a separate clause applied to it. I wish the railroads might be put in one clause with the whole theory of tax collection attached to it, street railroads in another, and express companies in another, because there are reasons of public policy and minutiae of detail which can not be made conveniently applicable in a wholesale style with all of them grouped together. This can be done in a legal shape conforming to judicial opinion. I should be glad to vote for certain exemptions or for a graduated scale of taxation.

In all schemes of taxation, whether levied directly upon incomes or net earnings, or upon the business from which they are derived, I presume there is not an enlightened commonwealth or modern nation which has not in some one act or another graduated taxes and made some exemptions. I pointed out the other day that this was the idea of Say, the great French political economist, and that Mr. Sumner, in a debate in this body, had emphatically shown his approbation of that system and advocated it in remarks which were worthy of consideration. This is the system which they have in England to-day, and I have in Whittaker's Almanac, page 184, a scheme of the income tax which is levied in Great Britain, which is as follows:

Income tax rates from 1853 to the present time.

* Differential rate upon scale of incomes abolished. Incomes under £100 exempt; and incomes of £100 and under £200 per annum received an abatement of 200 from the assessment: Thus £100 paid on £40; £180 upon £100; £190 upon £130, but £200 paid on £200.

† £50 allowed if under £200.

‡ Under £150 exempt; if under £400 the tax is not chargeable upon the first £150.

§ Under £160 exempt; not exceeding £400 the tax is not chargeable on first £100; not exceeding £500 the tax is not chargeable on first £100.

Here is the graded scale and also exemptions; and when we have the power to tax, it is not to be presumed that we may not employ the systems with the accustomed details that pertain to them as they are customarily employed by civilized states and nations.

I am sorry that with respect to the income tax our mother country has become more democratic than we are. The income tax in that country has existed for more than a hundred years. It has sometimes been dropped, but it has always been revived. It has always been popular in the House of Commons, the representatives of the people, and it has been frequently said in that country that it was a club used by the commons against the lords. Let us say for our great mother country that her rich men are willing out of their accumulated wealth to pay for the blessings which that nation has achieved for them. The income tax is as well settled a portion of the English budget as a property tax is in the budget of any State in the United States.

Sooner or later this country will return to an income tax. At present six gentlemen, holding the august office of Supreme Court judges, have said, against the opinion of nearly all other judges who ever before sat upon the bench, that we must not have an income tax. For the present we yield. It should, however, not be esteemed, Mr. President, nor fancied, that the great wealth of this country desires to throw the great weight of the burdens of taxation upon the poor, or the comparatively poor, or upon any particular class of society, merely because their incomes can not be taxed.

It is just as well and much better settled than is the income-tax decision that business may be taxed. It is in some measure taxed in this bill by the stamp tax; it is taxed in this bill by license taxes recommended by the gentlemen upon the committee and supported here by those who are opposing these particular taxes of which I am one of the advocates.

Mr. President, as incomes have been released from taxation, is it not just, is it not fair, is it not expedient and politic that we should tax business in this method, and thus leave the wealthy and the powerful not stripped of all power to make due participation in a great national fight? There is but one alternative, if we refuse to do it. The great weight and burden of war, if it be not done, must fall upon consumption—upon the consumption of the little tobacco that is the comfort of the toiling man, upon the glass of beer which cheers his evening meal, upon the medicine and upon the delicate foods which are prepared for the sick, ranging out into those matters which are the necessities or the humble luxuries of life. These are already taxed. They are taxed by the tariff bill. They are taxed by that whole system of taxation which looks toward foreign countries; and those upon whom the taxes which a majority of your committee have recommended will fall are the particular beneficiaries of the taxes upon consumption which have been prescribed by the tariff act.

Bread is going up in price already, Mr. President, and has been going up by reason of famine in other countries. Now that causation has been enlarged by war. It is well known as a fact in political economy that the poor people pay much more for the necessities of life in proportion to their means than the rich, for the reason that they must buy them at retail prices. A pound of sugar or a pound of meat or a loaf of bread to a poor man costs in proportion much more than a hundred pounds of sugar or a hundred pounds of meat or a hundred loaves of bread to the rich man; and this arises from the nature of things, because one can buy at wholesale price and the other must buy at retail. So, Mr. President, the poorer classes and the middle classes of society pay much larger proportions of whatever they derive from their wages or incomes for the purchase of whatever they need than do the rich.

The man who gets a dollar a day must spend all of his income to live. To the man who gets $100 a day it makes little difference whether he spends one or two or three or four or five or six or eight or ten dollars, for his margin of safety and comfort is forecast and provided for. These truths being known, is it not the part of wisdom not to increase taxes upon the consumption of the necessities and humble luxuries of life, but to open the door so that those may share in the burdens of taxation who have the larger amounts at disposal, the larger margins for living in comfort, and who are better possessed of ability to bear the obligation which is put upon them?

The distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] the other day said we ought not to impose this tax because the cotton factories of Maine were not in a flourishing condition. If so, it is not because the Congress of the United States has not done whatever they have asked to make them flourishing. It has built up a tariff largely for their benefit. I regret if they are not flourishing. I should love to see every industry in this country flourishing; but, Mr. President, this is only a transient thing. There is no day in the history of any nation in which all industries are flourishing.

One flourishes to-day and another flourishes to-morrow, and because one is a little or much depressed at any particular period of history by reason of causes which may be transient, or by reason of causes which may be permanent, is no reason why we should alter any great or general scheme of taxation applying to all the industries any more than the fact that a man is rich or poor should break up our scheme of taxation, which must apply to all men equally. In the long run it will be found the wisest and best not only for the public at large, but as well, in my judgment, for the corporations which shrink from this tax thus to diffuse taxation by small amounts levied upon a large range of subjects and covering the whole country, rather than upon articles which are only produced here and there in the country and yet are more broadly consumed.

Liberty must pay its price; the Constitution must pay its price; the blessings of this great and powerful nation must pay their price; war must pay its price; and it is a price, Mr. President, which I hope those whom I represent here will bear with fortitude, with ready patriotism, and without shrinking from any burdens which it may impose upon them. All that I ask in their name, and all that I could ask and fairly represent them, is that others may show that alacrity to bear their portion which is becoming to citizens of a common country, which would oppress none, but would ever keep foremost the equitable principle, "special privileges to none, equal rights to all."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, it is a source of much gratification that in the consideration of this bill during the past fortnight there has been little, if any, political friction or party zeal injected into it. Neither side has sought by the amendments so far introduced to this bill to give it a political complexion or a partisan character, but there has been an earnest attempt upon the part of Senators on both sides of the Chamber to make the bill that which every patriotic citizen desires it should be—a bill to bring adequate revenue to this country during the war upon which circumstances have compelled us to enter.

Nor has any amendment to the bill been introduced that could in the slightest degree be charged to be an amendment which sought delay or postponement of prompt and vigorous action by this Congress, and until the amendment, which was introduced on yesterday, concerning the Hawaiian Islands, there has been no suggestion respecting the measure which has not been directly germane and appropriate to it and to the subjects with which it deals.

Mr. President, for one I rejoice that some Western Senator, who might, because of his views on economic questions, be charged with a desire to delay or to postpone or to obstruct, was not the Senator who introduced the amendment concerning the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands as a part of this revenue bill. Whatever may be our view as to the wisdom or unwisdom of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands, I think that most of us will agree that it is a measure which should stand by itself and should not be tacked onto a revenue bill, with the essential, necessary result that final action upon the bill would be postponed for an almost interminable discussion.

In the consideration of this bill the Committee on Finance had to deal, first, with the question as to how much revenue this country should gather and garner for the purpose of carrying on the war. The estimates were many and various. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON], a member of the committee, has very ingeniously collated from the history of the last war the interesting fact that the average cost of a soldier during that struggle was about $1,000 a year. It will be more now, rather than less. So we had at the start, then, under both calls, to face the fact that the volunteer service alone of this country will cost $200,000,000 a year. No intelligent estimate can, in my judgment, be made as to the total expenses to be incurred by this war which does not find the amount at least $400,000,000 a year, and much of the tax to be raised must remain as a permanent addition to our annual revenue.

It is true, Mr. President, I believe, that the present tariff act works admirably. Its one defect is that it does not bring in as much revenue as the increasing needs of this country demand. There is no question, viewing the statistics of the last twelve months, that this country must raise somewhere from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 additional revenue from other sources in order to make our receipts equal our expenses, even upon a peace footing.

Mr. President, it is also true—and no Senator who has studied the question has any other opinion upon it—that because of the information we have received growing out of the preparations for the present war, it will be necessary for years to spend many millions of dollars more upon our Navy, even when peace shall come again, than we have spent upon it in the last ten or twenty years. We have got to figure an increase of the annual appropriations for our Navy of not less than $15,000,000.

It is also true that the developments of the last few months have shown us that, even after the war shall have ended, we must spend as a measure of precaution large sums upon our coast defenses, and no estimate can be made that shall exclude an addition of at least eight or ten million dollars, to be annually expended by this country for the next decade, if not for the next twenty years, upon the coast defenses of the United States.

So, Mr. President, in addition to the absolute war requirements, it was essential that this committee should provide for a permanent addition to the revenues of this country of not less than $50,000,000.

It has been often stated upon the floor of the Senate that we are now engaged in a war with a fourth or fifth rate power; that the war is not serious so far as the United States are concerned. Has it ever occurred to you, Mr. President, that with the exception of a conflict with Great Britain, and I am glad to realize that the possibilities of serious difficulties with that country have grown dim and remote, there is not a country in the world where so great an army expenditure is required as in this war with Spain. No other country has colonies, within thousands of miles of us, which it would be necessary for us to occupy. For the first time in the history of our land our troops have to take transports to reach the seat of war, to seek battle with the enemy. It never happened before, and it can never happen again.

No country in Europe, no matter how strong and powerful she may be, would require this country, if war existed, to furnish so great an army as Spain. Two hundred thousand volunteers are now called, and the chances are that half as many or as many more will be called before the war is over.

Mr. President, this war may not be one of speedy end. No man can mark the finality of the contest. An old and decaying power, with her vitality largely gone, is yet able to hold on in sullen resistance day after day, and week after week, and month after month, in the hope that the other nations of the world may intervene to help her, and no man can say this war shall be of short duration.

Nor in any estimate of revenues to be raised, and of the means to raise them, can we exclude from our vision the possibilities of great international complications which may grow out of this war. We hear the ominous rumors on every side that this may be the last struggle of the Latin races. We know of the tension that exists between all the countries of Europe, where it needs but a match to kindle a spark and that a flame which may spread the world over. No man can say, remote as we are from European countries and European complications, that, through the international friction now existing the world over, this nation may not be called upon to bear its share in some world-wide war which will embrace all the nations of the earth.

For my part I am unwilling to believe that any of the countries of Europe would interfere in this struggle between the United States and Spain, based as it is, not upon lust for power or aggrandizement, but solely upon principles of humanity. Least of all am I willing to believe the statements which we have been reading from time to time that the attitude of the Republic of France is one of hostility. The press of a country, I am glad to say, frequently misstates its public sentiment, and the press of France, in my opinion, does not reliably announce to the world the position of that Republic upon the existing contest.

It is within my own personal knowledge, Mr. President, that the present premier of France, M. Meïine, recently reelected by an overwhelming majority, is personally a friend, an intelligent friend, and wellwisher of this country, familiar with its institutions, sharing in its aspirations for republican perpetuity, and in every way hopeful for continued and pleasant relations between the two Governments. He has allied himself with the agricultural interests of France. He is a protectionist. His policy is largely the policy which now dominates this country, and for one I am unwilling to believe that complications may arise in that quarter. But from whatever source they may come, this country must be prepared and ready to endure with tranquility and equanimity and dignity whatever responsibility the actions of other countries may impose upon us.

Mr. President, the attitude of Great Britain toward this country has already been of incalculable help to us, and the inevitable tendency of events does more than any treaty signed and sealed between powers could do to bring about between these two great countries that friendly understanding which ought to exist. It is a matter of congratulation to the people of this country that the present premier of Great Britain and Mr. Balfour, who for a time occupied his place, while never underestimating the great and tremendous necessity for the commercial prosperity of Great Britain, have counted as far higher and nobler and better whatever tells for civilization, the prosperity of the world, and the uplifting of mankind. But if these troubles come, we have but one duty, and that is to show the world that we are ready to meet them face to face, recognizing our responsibilities and willing to assume them.

Many of us estimated in committee that the annual war expenditures would be about $400,000,000. Upon the presentation of that fact, the committee—and I am violating no confidence of the committee—by a majority vote determined that this generation should pay $150,000,000 of that amount, or whatever amount it might be necessary to raise. Since this Republic has been created we have had five wars, and in every one of them there has been a bond issue, and in every one of them the descendants of those who fought their wars have gladly and cheerfully and loyally and patriotically assumed the burden of that obligation and have been glad to pay it. We furnish the lives of our best and our bravest; we are willing to tax ourselves and to spend and to be spent for our country's prosperity and our country's honor, and posterity will never object that we call upon them to bear their fair share of the war's burdens and obligations.

We determined, as I say, that $150,000,000 at least should be raised by the provisions of this bill. It is due to the acting chairman of the committee and to every member of it to say that when that determination, was reached, there was a loyal and fair and honest effort so to amend and change the bill as that its minimum should be $150,000,000. That, in my opinion, is the minimum estimate here provided. I have heard it complained of on the floor of the Senate that this was not an estimate, but a guess. It is unfair to the reports of the committee and the statements made by its members to designate them as guesses. There has been no statistician in any of the Departments who has not been called upon again and again to furnish, so far as the statistics of the country would afford, the figures that would give us some adequate idea of what could be obtained by taxation under the various sections of the bill.

There has been no report in past years of the Internal Revenue Commissioners which has not been scanned and figured and considered in determining the revenue to be derived from the bill, and the conclusion which we have reached, including the estimate of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON], most carefully and intelligently and conscientiously made, while in my opinion it is far too low, is nevertheless not a guess, but an estimate. The estimate of the acting chairman of the committee, most carefully and ably made—made, I may say, by the one man in the United States who has in his own breast the greatest knowledge of the possible revenues of the country, of its methods of taxation, and the channels and avenues through which revenue by taxation may be derived and collected—is not a guess, but an estimate. He tells the Senate that $150,000,000 will be raised. In my opinion it will be far more, and my statement is an estimate and not a guess.

Mr. President, how are you going to make an accurate estimate? Our country jumped in population from 38,000,000 in 1870 to 50,000,000 in 1880, and then to 63,000,000 in 1890, and it is now 70,000,000. You can not base your estimate of increased receipts upon increase of population alone. It is but one factor. For instance, railroad tonnage has increased four times. The vessel tonnage on the Great Lakes, passing St. Marys in vessels, has increased twenty-five times. The increase of national banks is only about 50 per cent. Deposits in savings banks have increased fourfold. There have been since the repeal of our revenue laws in 1870 new discoveries in science, in electricity, new commercial ideas, new ventures, new industries springing on every hand, and vast areas opened to cultivation and to commerce. Who is to tell, measured by the revenues of the period from 1863 to 1870, what this generation can pay? No man can estimate it in figures and say or believe that he is absolutely correct.

But an intelligent man who tries to study the great development and growth of this country in its hundreds of different branches, as it reaches out in improvement and development, may be able to form some fair conclusion of what the provisions of the bill, when enforced and when the taxes are fairly collected, will bring to the support of the Government in this critical time.

We must remember that the first half year the machinery hardly gets oiled; that for months the revenues produced by the bill will be far less than you will afterwards gather, and in reaching a conclusion as to how much we can get we have to remember that six months will not determine it. We have also to determine how conditions will be changed by war itself. All the wheels of industry may be moving to-day, and yet some international complication or some of the vicissitudes of war or some of the results of this conflict may close half of them to-morrow, and the industries of the country be deadened and revenues proportionately decreased.

But out of it all, Mr. President, and out of what seemed a chaos of figures, the Committee on Finance has made a careful and an intelligent estimate, and it can go before the country with the assurance that the bill, even without the majority amendments, will bring a revenue to this Government of not less than $150,000,000, and it is my sincere conviction that it will bring a revenue of nearer $200,000,000.

There is no difference in principle between the amendments reported by this side of the Chamber and the amendments reported by the majority of the committee, so far as the taxation provided for in the bill is concerned. There is nothing Populistic or unfair in the amendments of the other side. It is another method of collection. It is a different method from the one we have adopted. I voted against it in committee and I expect to vote against it later; but I resent the suggestion that there is in those amendments anything which is intended or which can work, as the amendments now stand, unfairness or injustice generally to the industries of our country, and though, in my opinion, not the best method, it is as legitimate a method to increase the revenues of the country by levying upon gross receipts as it is to provide for them by other specific taxation.

But with us, with the minority of the committee, it was determined that this tax should be so levied, if possible, as to be self-collecting as far as possible and evidence its own payment. The committee determined that the great advantage of a tax was in its universality. People say that taxes by stamps or other methods are vexatious. Of course they are vexatious. But that the attention of almost every citizen in this country is called daily and in the ordinary vocations of life and in the work of every day to the fact that he is taxed to support this country in a war which it is waging is a fine and splendid and reasonable and seasonable reminder to every citizen of this country that the responsibility rests upon him as well as upon his fellow-citizen to provide the revenues for the carrying on of the war. It is also a stimulus to patriotism.

It is easy to say there are great aggregations of wealth in this country and they ought to pay all war expenses, and that the average man should not know there is a war going on. There never was anything in this country or in any country in any time worth having that did not come through a sacrifice. Whether it be the ordinary relations with your fellow-citizens or your relations to your country, you are not contributing anything that has value unless you contribute it through sacrifice, and there is no such stimulus to patriotism as for every citizen, poor as well as rich, to feel that he is bearing his share in the burden and heat of the day, and that his contribution, a mite though it be, is yet something toward the support of his Government in its day of trial and for the maintenance of the honor of the flag.

So we determined that these taxes should be made as universal as possible. Having this in view, we endeavored to impose the burden of taxation as equitably as possible. I shall have nothing to say upon the ordinary sources of taxation.

The beer tax of $2 a barrel and the tax upon tobacco were both agreed upon in committee with practical unanimity.

The tax on proprietary articles is one of which those of us who are not skilled in the technique and details of tariff bills know but little, but we are assured that the revenue from that source will reach a most adequate and important sum.

Then we went into stamp taxation generally. Every other country in the world has a stamp tax. No country is free from it. They have had it for generations in most countries, and you find a stamp required on the simplest paper in the world—almost every paper. Every country, rich and poor, finds a large portion of its revenue from the imposition of a stamp tax, and so it seemed to us that we should impose it and make it as general as possible, making the actual sum to be taxed light; and out of that who can tell how great a sum will be derived?

In my own State, for instance, where we have suffered since 1893 from the decline in one of the principal industries of our State, silver mining, important discoveries have led to enormous transactions, far greater than twenty-five years ago, and the stamps to be put upon conveyances of mining property will in our State alone reach an enormous sum. We went through with the bill as it came from the House, reducing, in almost every instance, the amount of the tax, and yet making it far more generally applicable to all the relations of life and to all the small businesses between men and men.

One or two important amendments with which I had some connection I think perhaps I may be pardoned if I dwell upon for a moment. We put on an amendment, which was not upon the bill as it came from the House, providing that every receipt of money, not of property, of whatever amount, should bear a 1-cent stamp. That of itself is universal. But we went further, and in our desire to reach fairly and adequately and properly the transportation companies of the country, we put an amendment upon the bill which will reach their revenues by a stamp tax; not by espionage, not by investigation of their books, but by a stamp tax which will be itself an evidence of its payment and which will practically collect itself.

In the imposition of this tax, as in the imposition of a tax upon every other trade and business which we reached, it was the desire of the committee, as it must be the desire of the Senate, to raise money and not crush out industries. Whatever we may desire to do in the way of legislation to crush out people who are doing a large business, or aggregations of capital which get together for the transaction of the affairs of life, it is at least proper to say that in this particular revenue measure, the object of which is to raise money, we do not intend by its provisions to strike at any industry to the extent of driving it out of business or hampering it in the transaction of its affairs, or in any way to prevent it from paying as large a revenue as possible to the Government.

We therefore inserted a provision in the bill requiring every carrier, every transporter of goods, of freight or merchandise, and this includes express companies, railroads, steamship companies, steamboat companies, and all other methods of inland transportation, to issue to the consignor of goods a bill of lading or a receipt or a memorandum, and upon that and upon any duplicate of it to affix a 1-cent stamp. It seems small enough, but I have been at some pains to collect rather accurate data as to what the measure would bring. I applied to two or three of the leading railroad companies in the United States and learned from them the number of receipts or bills of lading which they are in the habit of issuing. We then measured it by the freight tonnage upon the railroads, and we found it worked practically the same on all the railroads on which it was tested.

It seems to be true that the average shipment upon each line of railroad for which a separate bill of lading or receipt is given is about 4 tons in weight, and if you take any railroad and get its gross tonnage, by dividing it by 4 you will ascertain the number of receipts or waybills which it issues.

There are about 800,000,000 tons of freight carried upon the railroads of the United States. Dividing that number by 4, it gives you 200,000,000 bills of lading which would be issued.

These estimates, however, were not made from some of the larger roads, having close business connections with the large settled towns of the East, with small intervals of distance between, and they would add much to this estimate. I am now speaking of railroads alone. Assuming the number of bills of lading to be 200,000,000, this tax would bring from the railroads $2,000,000 upon this item alone. I am informed that in considerably more than three-quarters of the instances, duplicates of bills of lading are issued. One goes with the goods and one is delivered to the shipper. This would add one and one-half million dollars to the amount to be derived, yielding from bills of lading and the duplicates, from railroads alone, $3,500,000.

We are informed also by railroad officers that freight is very rarely prepaid. Not in 5 per cent of the cases is the freight prepaid for shipment upon railroads. Allowing that one-quarter of the freight is prepaid, you will then get from the receipts from money derived from payments for freight at the end of the route $1,750,000 additional, and the most conservative estimate that can be made respecting this item of the bill brings from railroads alone an income of upward of $5,000,000 more, considerably more than would be reached by the assessment of a quarter of 1 per cent upon the gross revenues of railroads, and the tax, in my opinion, is much more easily and more fairly collected.

There should be, in my opinion, an amendment to the amendment which has been offered by the committee to release from further receipt at the end of shipment such goods as have been prepaid. In other words, it is not fair to make the railroads pay the cent upon the bill of lading at its inception and to pay also the cent upon the receipt at the end, and such an amendment I have prepared and at the proper time shall offer.

As no laws general in their application work without specific injury to certain industries and to certain interests, I have to say that I think the committee has made one serious mistake in the imposition of the heavy tax upon express companies as included in this general section of the bill, for, curiously enough, an accurate statement of the packages carried by express companies shows that the packages carried by the four leading express companies of the United States are over 160,000,000, and taking the railroads which carry their own express matter, and there are several such railroads, the express packages carried upon the express lines of this country aggregate about 180,000,000, or almost as many as the number of packages or shipments carried by all the railroads of the country put together.

A tax, therefore, upon the express companies to the extent of 1 cent upon each package would collect from those express companies $1,800,000, or from the four principal express companies of the country $1,600,000. They are already taxed and taxed heavily often upon gross earnings in the different States of the Union. Their total capitalization is but $55,000,000, and the tax which by this single section is imposed upon express companies is a tax amounting to 2½ per cent upon their capitalization, a tax which, it is needless to say, the express companies can not pay and continue their business without raising their prices.

You would say they might collect this from the customer, but they can not, because the express packages are received by wagons and not at the offices. Ninety per cent of all the express packages of the country are received in wagons, which in all towns above 2,000 go about collecting shipments. In the large cities they are often rushed down chutes from upper stories. They are handed to the driver by messenger boys. It is impossible to collect the 1 cent from the customer. One might say they could add the penny to the cost of the package. They can not, because the contracts of most express companies with railroads call for 50 per cent of the gross receipts, and if the express companies should add 1 cent for the purpose of covering the stamp, they would have to pay one-half of it to the railroads with which they transact business. This is by way of digression and solely to give to the Senate notice that I shall at the proper time offer and ask the Senate to accept an amendment to cover this oversight.

The committee also imposed, by a practically unanimous vote, a personal legacy succession tax, a tax which has been already somewhat discussed in this Chamber. It is a tax which has existed since the time of the Romans. It was enacted first in the time of Augustus, and it has been in force in many countries from that day to this. We do not seek to touch the real estate of anybody. That is visible and tangible and open, and the States can reach it. But unfortunately this country has not, and perhaps no country has, as yet developed a very scrupulous desire on the part of its citizens to pay their fair share of taxes.

It is difficult to tell why, but the man who is otherwise a man of average morality will in nine cases out of ten avoid the payment of taxes if possible. We have not yet reached the stage of public patriotism and public morality which makes the average man desire to pay to his country his share of the taxes which are imposed. And one man satisfies his conscience when he avoids the payment of them by saying to himself that his neighbor has done the same, and there is no reason why he should pay what his neighbor does not. When a man comes to die and his estate comes to be administered upon, then there is always a disclosure as to how much personal property he owned.

It is fair that that should be taxed by his Government upon a scale proportioned to his success, and in recognition of the fact that the amassing of his fortune was made possible by the protection which his country and its laws had afforded him in the acquisition of his wealth. The tax, as the committee has laid it, is a very slight. It interferes with no State tax. There are some thirteen States already collecting this tax from the estates of people who die. It interferes with none of them, and is a just tax equally distributed, and small in amount.

Mr. President, there is a peculiar propriety in levying such a tax by the National Government. You all remember that a similar tax was enacted by the legislature in the State of New York, and one of the reasons given for its repeal by the governor of the State was that if such a tax were imposed, the people of the State of New York who had money would move over into the State of New Jersey, or somewhere else where such a tax was not imposed, and would there live and die in peace, and nobody would get any money out of their estates.

It is a tax that disturbs nobody. The man who is dead does not care; he is ended; and the men who come into the estate are receiving the bounty of an inheritance, and the small toll they pay their Government upon its reception is light in burden and easy to pay.

Then, in addition to that tax we impose those taxes on businesses only which were either of the peculiar character attending the business of banking, which should legitimately pay a fair tax, or else a tax upon the brokers, who are essentially middlemen, whose profits are good, often large, and who are not exactly the producers of this world. We have licensed them, the bankers, the brokers, the pawnbrokers, the commercial brokers, the custom-house brokers, the insurance agents, and different forms of amusements as well—theaters, circuses, etc. Upon them we can form something of an estimate of the tax to be derived, and the figures given in the revenue reports prior to 1870 give but a slight indication of the large amount which will be received from these taxes under the proposed law.

Now, Mr. President, I have very briefly and very hastily and very roughly stated most of the salient provisions of the bill which the Republican members of the committee joined in recommending, so far as the revenue was concerned. The majority of the committee, however, added to the bill certain provisions taxing the gross receipts of all corporations. As near as I can understand from the general course of the debate on the other side, there is a general inclination to strike out from those taxes on gross receipts all those corporations except the transportation companies, the common carriers, and the larger corporations.

If that be true, the tax is much fairer in its character than it was before, because it is not a fair division of a tax, it seems to me, to say that those who are already incorporated in one business shall pay the same tax as an individual who may be doing the same business next door in his own name.

But, Mr. President, it is my opinion, while the proposed tax is not large, that it is not as fair a method of levying it as that which has been reported by the Republican members of the committee. I take it, as a matter of course, that no member of the committee would desire that both methods of taxation should remain in the bill. That would be an oppression for which I think no member of the Senate would care to vote.

Mr. President, on the general question of railroads there are one or two things that ought to be considered. It is not quite a favorable time to impose such a tax upon them as that the burden of it shall seriously interfere with or affect their business. The railroads of the United States pay to-day in the different States, taking their total mileage, their capital, and the total tax levied in the different States, 3.49 per cent upon their gross receipts. That is not a slight tax, Mr. President, but that is the tax at present imposed upon railroads in the United States. This is the percentage of tax upon their gross receipts. They pay 16.6 per cent upon their net receipts.

I do not think that anybody would believe that a corporation or an individual which already pays to the States 16 per cent upon its net receipts should be called upon to pay a much heavier burden based upon gross receipts. If you deduct the fixed charges, that is, the money they must pay upon interest, upon bonds, which is a fixed charge, and comes before the dividends, the present taxation of railroads in the United States is 44½ per cent upon net earnings, deducting fixed charges, figures, Mr. President, which are of some magnitude and of some importance when we come to consider how far we ought to go in taxing railroads.

There were, in 1894, 28½ per cent of all the railroads of the United States in mileage in the hands of receivers, and there are to-day 16½ per cent of all the railroads of the United States in the hands of receivers and still being run by Federal courts, unable to meet their obligations, unable to do business as incorporated companies.

These most significant figures are an indication to me that if what this bill seeks is revenue we should so meet the demands which the war causes as to levy these taxes where they would be most fairly imposed. And, Mr. President, a large tax does not necessarily become a fair tax because you levy it on a company with a large capital. That is a mistake, it seems to me, which people are apt to make. "Why," we say, "this company has a capital of $50,000,000; give it to them!" It may have $50,000,000 capital, much of which has been unprofitably invested and which brings no return upon its investment.

The only fair method of taxation to obtain revenue is to tax those industries and those individuals and those callings which can with the least detriment pay their share toward maintaining the expenses of the Government.

There were other objections, it seemed to me, of a somewhat minor character, which I do not care to dwell upon, in some of the amendments suggested by the majority of the committee. The tax upon deposits in banks did not appeal to me as a fair tax. One suggestion will show, for instance, its unequal character. Under the proposed law we tax all bank deposits. National banks are required to keep a certain portion of their deposits with certain designated bank depositaries. That is true. I think we will all agree to that.

Take, for instance, a bank in Denver which has deposits upon which, under this bill, it would have to pay a tax. It has a portion of its deposits at Omaha in a designated depositary. The bank at Omaha pays also the tax upon that deposit, which by law the Denver bank is required to make. The bank at Omaha has a deposit in a national bank at Chicago, a designated depositary. The tax reaches the same money, the same deposit. That bank has to pay upon its Chicago deposit. The bank in Chicago has its great deposit in the city of New York at a designated depositary. Thus you reach in cases a quintuple taxation, which certainly the framers of this bill did not intend.

But I do not think it wise, I know it is not wise, for me at this time to go further into the amendments offered by the majority of the committee concerning the taxation of corporations. It is my opinion that a much fairer and wiser and more conservative method is that which is reached by the provisions of the bill as reported by the Republican members of the committee.

Now, Mr. President, having passed briefly over the provisions of the bill as to the taxation of property and the raising of revenue, we come to the question as to how the deficit between the expenses and the amount raised by the revenue ought to be reached, and in one respect there was in the committee a wide divergence.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the Senator to say that it was the desire of the committee that every person in the country should have an opportunity to pay a fair, proportionate share of the burdens of the war.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes; everybody who could afford to pay it, who had something upon which to pay it. I should not say "every person."

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Colorado or some other member of the committee tell me why it is that a tax on tea and coffee was not put into the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I would very much rather somebody besides myself should tell the Senator from South Carolina, because personally I am extremely favorable to the imposition of such a tax. A tax of 15 cents a pound on tea would bring nearly $2,000,000 to this country. It would not raise the price of tea a penny. It would bring us a great deal better tea than we ever had before, and would work no hardship on anybody.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Colorado does not want to answer me, I hope some of the other Senators when discussing the question after a while will do so.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should be very glad to do it. I answered the Senator in the utmost good faith. I am very much in favor of the tax.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask the Senator if the tea dealers are not universally in favor of the tax being laid?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Every one, I think. They are represented here by some very intelligent gentlemen.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Colorado will excuse me, I will state that I am acquainted with but very few Senators on this floor who are opposed to a tax on tea in their individual view.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then why did not the tax come in?

Mr. WOLCOTT. One objection, I think I should say to the Senator from South Carolina, has been recalled to my mind. It was stated in the committee that there are no tariff duties in the bill, and it was believed by many members of the committee that the question of tariff should, as far as possible, be excluded from the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. It seems that we are hunting money, and as a practical man I do not see any reason why we could not put into this bill or into an independent measure a provision looking to the raising of money in a universal way, and one that will bear more lightly, or at least with as much lightness, as any other tax that can be imposed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that if he will introduce such an amendment, putting a tax of 15 cents a pound on tea, I will, upon the risk of the criticism of my associates on the committee, vote for it with the greatest pleasure, and I think a good many other Senators would be very glad to do so.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think I will give somebody an opportunity to vote on it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, leaving now the provisions as to revenue, I come to the provision as to how so much of this money shall be raised as has to be raised by other means. As I said, a wide divergence of opinion was developed upon one single ground to which I shall come, and that is, the issuing of greenbacks. But the amendment of the majority of the committee was twofold. It suggested instead of bonds the raising of the money, first, by the coinage of the surplus bullion in the Treasury, which by a certain misnomer in the law of 1890 is called gain or seigniorage. First, it was to be raised by the coinage of the surplus bullion in the Treasury into dollars, which would bring to the Treasury $42,000,000; and second, by the issue of $150,000,000 of additional greenbacks.

As to the first provision, I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the majority of the committee, and, so far as I may, I desire to urge upon the members of the Senate of both political parties that they take from out the Treasury the bullion which lies there now useless and serves no purpose, and which could be brought into the currency of the country without disturbing its credit, without disturbing its balance. I say let us take from the Treasury the useless silver in bullion and make it alive and active for the purposes for which it was intended.

Mr. President, it is only its name that discredits it. We have got so lately, apparently, that anything with the name of silver in the Senate is to be discredited. But if Senators would only consider it as it is, a live, vital asset, which when once clothed with coinage and with form would be launched into this country the equal of any dollar coined within it, they would accept it.

Neither this nor any other provision of the bill has any relation to the general question of bimetalism whatever. These are hard and bitter days for the bimetalists of the world. We see an attempt in India to force the standard of gold upon a great country by the most cruel experiment that was ever tried, of destroying its present coinage by reducing a large share of it to bullion and selling it as merchandise, and making what is left more valuable by its scarcity alone. We see the attempt all over the world to drive out from recognition silver as a standard of value equally with gold.

For myself, Mr. President, I still cherish, and I shall cherish as long as I live, the conviction that prosperity can never come to this country until it comes by a restoration of both silver and gold as a standard, upon a parity to be internationally agreed upon, if you like, but in some method to be restored to the coinage of the world.

But this measure in none of its bearings has anything to do directly with the question of bimetalism. The seigniorage is there. The dollars already coined serve as the sole security for the certificates that are issued upon them. The bullion that is left is no additional security, and the law does not make it any additional security for the dollars upon which certificates have been already issued.

This money could be coined without the slightest injury to the credit or the welfare of our country. I have prepared an amendment, which I shall take the liberty of reading and then offer, which is very brief, and to which I hope I may have the approval of the members of the Senate upon both sides of the Chamber. The amendment as reported by the majority of the committee provides for an immediate issue of the certificates to the full amount of the seigniorage now in the Treasury.

The amendment as I have prepared it (I will perhaps state its terms instead of reading it, and then send it to the desk and ask to have it read at the conclusion of my remarks) requires that all the bullion now in the Treasury shall be coined at a minimum of $4,000,000 per month; that upon the first $42,000,000 as coined certificates shall be issued as the same are coined, and they go into the Treasury of the United States available as a war fund, and that the whole amount shall be coined in due course.

Then, inasmuch as the law of 1890 required that this bullion should be coined from time to time for the purpose of the redemption of the Treasury notes issued upon the bullion, and inasmuch as this amendment would consume the time and facilities of the mints for some months to come, I have added a proviso that these dollars as coined shall stand as well for the redemption of Treasury notes outstanding as for certificates to be issued under the act.

If the amendment can be adopted it seems to me that the country can safely enter upon the disposition of its coinage. Men who are bimetalists, and men who are not bimetalists, are alike desirous of having it out of the Treasury. From a purely bimetallic standpoint there are two sides to the question of coining the seigniorage. One of the reasons which we give for the need for additional silver and the opening of our mints to silver has been the necessity for more currency, and we want fresh silver, silver offered in open mints; and this of course would take its place to the extent of the amount to which it is coined. But it stands there as a menace, it stands there useless, it stands there idle, and it ought to be coined and be out doing its duty in the money of the country.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will ask the Senator from Colorado whether our mints are equal to the coinage of $4,000,000 a month?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am informed by a somewhat careful estimate, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky, that our mints are equal to a coinage of nearly $5,000,000, and that if we put upon the deficiency appropriation bill or elsewhere a provision making the proper appropriation, $4,000,000 a month at least can be easily and readily coined.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Colorado will excuse me, I think one of the difficulties in the matter of coining a great deal of silver has been that in some mode, I do not know just how, the principal part of the bullion is deemed more available at the Philadelphia Mint, and that the difficulty has been in utilizing the force as to its disposition at other places where there are mints.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is true.

The other suggestion by the majority of the committee is one to which, I regret to say, I see only the most serious objection. The majority of the committee propose by a forced loan to add to the currency of the country $150,000,000 in paper money, the effect of the issuance of which must dilute the currency and lessen proportionately the coin basis, gold and silver, which stands back of the issuance of this money. The issue of $150,000,000 in additional paper money, as proposed by this amendment, can never be backed with either gold or silver to make it better without the issue of bonds for the purpose of buying the coin to put it in the Treasury.

When we once issue this paper money and put it into our currency we can never put gold back of it or we can never put silver back of it unless we issue bonds for that purpose. It is a plain, open dilution of the currency of the United States, the effect of which can only be in this crisis upon which we are entering to degrade our money, to impair our credit, to sow the seeds of distrust, and destroy our ability to stand back of our paper money, as every good citizen in this country desires we should do.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let me ask the Senator from Nevada—he talks very often and I talk very rarely—will he not wait until I am through, and then will the Senator kindly follow me, and not interject his remarks into mine? I shall appreciate it very much if the Senator from Nevada will permit me to proceed as I am proceeding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado declines to yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. As I was proceeding to say, as to this $150,000,000, for myself, I am a hard-money man, and I think almost every bimetalist in the United States is a hard-money man. We have based the foundation of our belief and of our arguments for years upon the assertion that the substantial foundation and rock of the nation's financial policy should be hard money—gold and silver, the money of the Constitution, money which is its own redeemer, money of ultimate redemption. That, Mr. President, has been our argument for all these years, in season and out of season, though with less success than I wish could have attended our efforts.

Now, I am shocked and surprised at the attitude of Senators upon the other side, men whom I know to be bimetalists, men whom I know do not belong to the Populistic wing of that party, which only wants silver as a means to more money, and would just as soon have tin or paper or anything, so you increase circulation; rock-ribbed members of the Democratic party, always a hard-money party, as shown by vote after vote for years on the other side of the Chamber; Senators who have contended that the Democratic party was a hard-money party, and that all it wanted was the money of the Constitution—gold and silver. And now, in the face of this war, which they as well as we, and equally with us and all equally with each other, are responsible for precipitating upon this world because we believe it is right—it seems to me it is a pretty poor time to come with a suggestion that our first step in the face of Europe, with the possibility of confronting an armed world—our first step shall be to disgrace and dishonor our paper money by putting out $150,000,000 of it, with no gold and no silver back of it to maintain and support it. As a bimetalist, I do not propose to be caught in that kind of a trap.

Then, as against this were the propositions of the Republican members of the committee—to which I still hope they will add the coinage of the seigniorage—the proposal that we should raise such additional revenues as may be needed by the issue of certificates to the extent of $100,000,000 and by the issue of a limited amount of bonds.

Mr. President, the amount of bonds to be issued, as the bill originally came from the House of Representatives, was $500,000,000, a sum largely in excess of any possible needs, certainly while Congress is sitting frequently; but it was very reluctantly that I voted to lessen the amount. We had stood up before the world and said, "We are going to fight because we will not have oppression on this hemisphere, and the resources of our country shall be spent like water if necessary to vindicate our position." The other House, in which the bill necessarily originated, pledged the faith and credit of the Government to the extent of $500,000,000 for that purpose—more than was needed, but a notice to all the world that this young Republic counted its treasure as nothing when it was battling for the right, and I confess my hesitancy in cutting the figure down to $300,000,000.

But we did more than that. We provided that these certificates, as well as these bonds, should be presented to the public and offered as a popular loan. As the measure first came to us it contemplated bids for the bonds.

What would men in a remote town know about bidding, say, 101.64 for a certain amount of bonds? They can not form syndicates and coalesce with bankers; and if there was to be a profit in this loan the people should have it, and not the bankers. So the committee has passed what, in my opinion, is a most wise provision, that these bonds and these certificates shall be offered at par, and at par only; that they shall be offered through every channel the country commands, every little post-office, every express station, every bank the whole country over, to the people at par.

We have also inserted a provision that those bids that are the least in amount and are from individuals shall be first accepted. I do not know what the opinions of others may be, but I have no question that the people of these United States, of small savings but great patriotism, are the men who are going to buy and to own and to hold these bonds, and to glory in the fact that their little possessions are helping to carry on the war.

It is true that there has been one discordant note in this almost universal expression of opinion that the people would take these bonds. It is unfortunately the fact that our Secretary of the Treasury in his statement before the Committee on Finance deliberately said that he did not believe that the people would take these bonds. I am glad to say, Mr. President, that I think he is the only man in this country who cherishes that belief, which is very possibly father to his hope; but it is not for me to criticize him. He stands, I understand, in the Cabinet as the representative, as the sole representative, I am glad to say, of that respectable and limited and affluent body of men known as Gold Democrats, and he, if nobody else, must be true to the spirit of the Indianapolis platform, which sought to turn the finances of the country over to the bankers of the United States.

But, Mr. President, the people want these bonds if they can get them fairly and upon right terms and legitimately offered; and whatever may be the personal desires or predilections of the Secretary of the Treasury, if this bill shall become a law, then these bonds will go into many thousands of households throughout the land, and each man who holds them will be proud of the fact that he owns the security of his country and is helping to carry on the war—not a gold bond, not a silver bond, but a coin bond, as every other bond of the United States which has been issued has been, and as, I trust, every other bond of the United States which will be issued for many a day to come will be. So these bonds will go out; the industries of the country will not suffer; money will be coming into the Treasury, not from syndicates or bankers, who will gather them at a profit and market them at a greater, but they will go at first hand by direct dealing between the Government and the people, and as they rise in value, as they surely will, the people will receive the profit.

Mr. President, this debt will be large and formidable, and we shall leave it for the future to pay. Each generation since the foundation of this Republic has inherited obligations of a similar character; but if we are true to those principles of humanity which have so far animated our action, and which have made this war inevitable, we shall transmit to those who are to come after us that which will make this financial load seem trifling and light of burden, for they will cherish while this nation endures the proud consciousness that this people, in this year of grace, were intolerant of oppression upon this hemisphere and counted no sacrifice of life or commercial prosperity too great that brought freedom to the downtrodden, even while their own liberties were unassailed. And, Mr. President, unless all omens fail, we shall leave as well upon the pages of history the glorious truth, to serve for all time as a warning and an illustration, that in the world's struggle for freedom and for right the English-speaking people stand shoulder to shoulder, alike devoted to the principles of eternal justice and indissolubly linked in one common and immortal destiny.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the Senator will allow me, I will offer at this time the amendment which I have prepared.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Colorado will permit, I suggest if he will offer the several amendments to which he has referred, perhaps it will facilitate matters.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will try to get them all in at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado presents amendments to the pending bill and asks that they be printed, as the Chair understands.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the question which I proposed to put to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I understood him to argue that if we issued greenbacks now, the only method we should have for obtaining coin with which to redeem them would be by the sale of bonds. At the present time we have a considerable part of our revenue coming in in gold, but we all know that gold is a great traitor and is liable to go away whenever somebody else wants it, and that it becomes naturalized under foreign laws. So gold can not be relied upon to come in as revenue with which to pay anything. We do not know whether it will be here when we want it; but there is one thing that we do know, and that is that more than half of our current revenue to-day is paid in silver—it is true it is in silver certificates, but all you have got to do is to go to the next counter and get them exchanged for silver. So that there will be no difficulty whatever in redeeming these greenbacks in silver according to the contract.

To this it may be suggested that we shall have an Administration which will not respect contracts, that the law will be violated, and bonds issued to buy gold. We have no means of answering a suggestion of that character; but I say if you put out five or six hundred millions of gold bonds you will be in a worse condition than you are now; you will have to borrow gold, and if gold runs off you must use silver. Under the policy which has been adopted you will be compelled to borrow gold to pay interest, and finally you will have to borrow gold to pay the principal. What I desire is that we shall commence to pay current expenses.

It is not true that each generation in this country has been mortgaging the succeeding generation. The United States was not in the habit previous to the late war of issuing long-time bonds, and we were not very much in the habit of it during that war, for we had very few long-time bonds. Most of the bonds were issued by the Government on short time. Since the war, however, this scheme of mortgaging the future of the country has been adopted. It is only since the war that bonds have been used for speculative purposes; it is only since the war that an attempt has been made to enslave the people through a large bonded debt.

If you put out $150,000,000, or if you put out $300,000,000 of greenbacks, you would add to the circulation that much and increase your business that much, and at the same time increase your revenue during the current year from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000. I have no doubt, judging by the past. So that the issuing of this $150,000,000 of greenbacks will not only increase your revenue by enlarging business—because it is upon business that this revenue bill is based, as I argued the other day—and when you have plenty of money you can get plenty of revenue from business. When we were putting out silver during fourteen years we paid off $17,000,000 of the bonded debt, and we had a surplus of revenue of from $75,000,000 to $80,000,000 a year; whilst during the last five years, when the Government has put out no new money, we have had a deficiency in the revenue, although the taxation has been more grievous.

You can not collect revenue from business that is strangled for the want of money. Experience has shown that. If you get this $150,000,000, it will add more to your revenue, in addition to the $150,000,000 itself, than would $200,000,000 of bonds.

I undertake to say that, take the next two years, the proposition to coin the seigniorage and put out $150,000,000 will bring more money into the Treasury than the sale of $600,000,000 of bonds, and at the end of that time we shall have no debt. The desire of some parties to load this country with a bonded debt is born of a desire to turn the country over to the banks, to organize a government of plutocracy. Every man who gets one of these bonds will immediately be fighting with the plutocrats to increase the value of money, while even the laboring man who is out of employment will take the gold dollar because he thinks it will buy more than the silver dollar, although that is a mistake. He wants what he thinks is the very best money with which to do his marketing.

Every man who gets a bond will join the army of bondholders, the army of gold mongers, the army of the creditor class, which is arrayed against the industries of the country and which has prostrated the industries of the country. If you enforce such a policy, you will destroy half of the productive industries of the country, you will aid the enemies of the country, the enemies of mankind. The more bonds you put out the larger the army of oppressors will be.

Senators talk about having nothing with which to redeem the greenbacks but borrowed money. When gold is coming in and silver is coming in, does anybody doubt that there will ever be a day or an hour when there will not be an abundance of coin in the Treasury to meet the paper which may be presented for redemption? There will be no trouble if we can get an honest Secretary of the Treasury, who will hold to the option which belongs to the Government and not give it to the gold gamblers and not join the gang which is raiding the Treasury. The Treasury could not have been raided in 1893 if the Administration had not cooperated with the raiders. I hope the time will come when we shall have a man at the head of the Treasury who will represent the interests of a majority of the people, and not the interests of the gold gamblers. If we have a man there who will act in the interests of the people and will execute the law, everybody knows there will be an abundance of coin to redeem this paper money for all time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MASON. I shall be very willing to have that vote taken before I address myself to the amendment I have offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] who offered it.

Mr. GORMAN. Before the Secretary begins to read the amendment, I desire to modify it, at the suggestion of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], in line 7, on page 2, by inserting, after the word "business," the words "in excess of said sum of $250,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification referred to by the Senator appears in the amendment which the Secretary is about to read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "Corporations," in line 4, on page 59, to and including line 9, on page 61, and all from the word "and," in line 17, on page 61, to and including line 24, on page 63, and to insert the following:

That from and after the passage of this act every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing or having the care or management of any railroad, street railroad, sleeping car, steamboat, ship, or other vessel engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or freight for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, or carrying on or doing an express business, or having the care or management of any telegraphic or telephone line by which telegraphic or telephone dispatches or messages are received or transmitted, or carrying on or doing the business of furnishing gas or electric light, electric power, steam heat, or steam power, or refining petroleum, or refining sugar, or owning or controlling any pipe line for transporting oil or other products, whose gross annual receipts exceed $250,000, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax equivalent to one-half of 1 per cent on the gross amount of all receipts of such persons, firms, corporations, and companies in their respective business in excess of said sum of $250,000: Provided, That the assessment hereby made shall not include any amount for the receipts for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails between the United States and any foreign port; but such tax shall be rated for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails from a port within the United States through a foreign territory to a port within the United States, and shall be assessed upon and collected from persons, firms, companies, or corporations within the United States receiving hire or pay for such transportation of persons, freight, or mails.

And a true and accurate return of the amount of gross receipts as aforesaid shall be made and rendered monthly by each of such associations, corporations, companies, or persons to the collector of the district in which any such association, corporation, or company may be located, or in which such person has his place of business. Such return shall be verified under oath by the person making the same, or, in case of corporations, by the president or chief officer thereof. Any person failing or refusing to make return as aforesaid, or who shall make a false or fraudulent return, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000 for each and every false or fraudulent return.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will not be in order, the Chair will inform the Senator from South Dakota, as it would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Is there an amendment pending to the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland has offered an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I give notice that when that is disposed of I shall offer my amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I understood the Chair to state that the Senator from Maryland had accepted some amendment to his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland has modified his own amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. How?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the modification which has been made.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 7, after the word "business," the amendment is modified by inserting "in excess of said sum of $250,000."

Mr. GORMAN. So as to have the exemption of $250,000 uniform.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask that there shall be a division of the question. The proposition is to strike out and insert. I ask for a vote first on the motion to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rules the Senator is entitled to have the question divided.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the matter, but simply to call attention to the nature of this question as it is now presented. As I understand this amendment of the Senator from Maryland, it is to strike out from line 4, on page 59, to and including line 9, on page 61, and the substitute which he offers is apropos of that portion of the bill. The Senator also moves to strike out an independent clause which relates to other corporations than those mentioned in the matter for which he proposes the substitute. In other words, the motion to strike out reaches over matter not comprehended in the substitute, and removes other portions of the bill.

I would ask the Senator from Maryland if he would not be willing to eliminate from his motion to strike out that matter relating to the second clause about corporations? It not only presents the question of exemption as to amount, but comprehends a great deal of matter in the bill not included in the part for which he offered his substitute. In this form I could not vote for the amendment, though I might approve or be willing to accept the exempting phrase. Why not let the Senator from Maryland, if he will accept the suggestion, simply move to strike out the matter which the substitute he proposes relates to, and make an independent motion to strike out all the other portion?

It seems to me, sir, that we are confusing this subject and rather preventing the differentiation of our opinions than assisting it by being confined to the motion of the Senator from Maryland, which, as I understand the Chair to rule, we can not move to amend.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ruled that a further amendment would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. DANIEL. We can not move to amend the substitute proposed by the Senator from Maryland. If he were simply proposing to amend portions of the matter which the substitute comprehends, we might vote without being involved in contradiction of ourselves, but, as the matter is thus somewhat confusingly presented, we might wish to make an exemption and yet could not vote for the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] to the parliamentary inquiry the Senator made, as he may have misunderstood the Chair. The Chair simply holds that the two principal questions are open to amendment; but when the final question is put, it must be without division. That portion of the text which is to be stricken out may be amended by itself, and the portion to be inserted may be amended by itself; but when the final vote comes, it must be on both striking out and inserting.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The rule of the Senate is that a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible; I so understand on looking at the rule. The point I wish to make is this: If the Senate desires to strike out the words which the Senator from Maryland moves to strike out, and the Senate does strike them out, then I am in favor of inserting what the Senator from Maryland proposes, and I should like to have two votes on it and not one. There may be Senators who would not be willing to strike out and insert as a matter of preferring the proposition of the Senator from Maryland to the proposition in the bill, but if the majority of the Senate sees fit to strike out what is in the bill, then I for one should be very earnestly in favor of adopting the proposition submitted by the Senator from Maryland, and I prefer that the Senator from Maryland should have the vote taken that way.

As we have no right to divide the question, I should be glad if he would make the motion first to strike out the part of the amendment which he proposes to strike out, giving notice of his intention to insert what he proposes in his amendment. By that means we can all vote intelligently and to the point which we wish to reach—at least I can.

Mr. ALLISON. May I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas how he can reach what he desires? The amendment of the Senator from Maryland, I understand, is a complete amendment in and of itself, and as the Senator from Arkansas seems to desire to test the Senate first as to amendment 177, I suggest that we take a vote now upon that amendment as it stands. If that shall be voted out, then, of course, any other amendment would be in order.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I would prefer, and I think the Senator from Maryland would, not to take that vote now, because that involves the question from lines 19 to 17, on page 61, as to banks.

Mr. GORMAN. We are proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement to consider the amendments of the committee first, and at this stage, unless there is consent of the Senate to offer my substitute, it would not be in order at any time until the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand that. Suppose amendment No. 177 is voted out?

Mr. GORMAN. Suppose it is voted in; then my substitute can not be offered until the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true.

Mr. GORMAN. We all want a fair vote; and I suggest, if the Senator from Iowa in charge of the bill will permit it, that by unanimous consent we vote directly upon the committee amendment No. 177, with the understanding or consent that if that shall be adopted I shall have the right, without objection, to offer my substitute for it.

Mr. CHILTON. That is fair.

Mr. GORMAN. That will test it.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall make no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Maryland to make that request?

Mr. GORMAN. I make the suggestion. I do not want to take the management of the bill from the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator can temporarily withdraw the amendment, and that will settle the question.

Mr. GORMAN. I will temporarily withdraw it, with that understanding. We will then have a direct vote on amendment No. 177.

Mr. WHITE. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, there is no objection and there can be none to dividing the several propositions contained in amendment 177. Amendment 177 covers numerous topics, and I should like to vote upon them separately.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think it is necessary to have any understanding about that. My purpose, when I get an opportunity, is to test the Senate by moving to lay the entire amendment on the table for the purpose—

Mr. ALLISON. This is a good time to test it, if the Senator desires to do that.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is my purpose at the proper time. I do not like to make that motion until discussion is exhausted.

Mr. BERRY. Which amendment?

Mr. ALDRICH. Amendment No. 177—the committee amendment.

Mr. STEWART (to Mr. ALDRICH). Make it now.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am willing to make it now.

Mr. HALE. That will settle it.

Mr. ALLISON. That will reach the question.

Mr. GORMAN. I can not hear a word, and I should like to hear the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes to move to lay the committee amendment on the table. That accomplishes the same purpose.

Mr. GORMAN. All right.

Mr. ALDRICH. I make that motion now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland withdraw his amendment?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, temporarily.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President—

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not desire to cut off debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to lay on the table amendment No. 177.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the Senator from Virginia wants to make some remarks. I have no disposition to cut off debate.

Mr. DANIEL. There are one or two little things that ought to be perfected.

Mr. FAULKNER. If we do not lay the amendment on the table, it can be amended afterwards.

Mr. DANIEL. I think the amendments should be made.

Mr. ALDRICH. I make the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me that the Senator from Maryland is taking an improper course in this matter. The proper course is to move to strike out and insert, in order to give us a fair show and a fair test on this question. The part of the bill proposed to be stricken out is of a twofold character. The first part of it covers in substance what the Senator from Maryland aims to cover with his amendment, that is, a tax upon certain classes of corporations like railroad transportation companies, telegraph companies, and other special companies, but there is another sweeping paragraph in the amendment, and that is that part of it which proposes to tax every corporation in the land.

Now, those two propositions are entirely distinct, and the fair question to put to the Senate is whether we shall substitute for the entire amendment the proposition of the Senator from Maryland. I am free to say that if that proposition is amended and reduced to a quarter of a cent and made a substitute for the whole amendment No. 177 I should vote for it. But as the Senator proposes to have the question put, it leaves us all very much embarrassed. I trust he will adhere to his original proposition and move it as a substitute for the entire amendment after we have had a chance to perfect his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to lay on the table amendment No. 177.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Rhode Island withhold his motion for a moment, as I desire to say a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island withdraw the motion?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do, temporarily.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island withdraws his motion.
Mr. BACON. It is only for a moment or two. I do not want to discuss the question at length.

I was very much in hope that this matter could be put in shape where we could give the most intelligent expression to our wishes. It does seem to me that to call upon us to vote on the original committee amendment or upon a motion to lay it on the table is not to give us that opportunity. For myself I do not know that I shall vote for the committee amendment in its present shape. At the same time I am in favor of a tax of this character, very much modified. I therefore deprecate the proposition which is now made to put us in a position where we are called upon to vote upon a measure before it is perfected.

A fundamental rule in all parliamentary proceedings is that before members of a legislative body shall be called upon to vote the proposition shall be put in the shape its friends desire to have it. Then let the contest come. A motion to lay on the table necessarily brings up a square question as to support or opposition to the amendment in the shape it comes from the committee. For instance, to vote to lay it on the table is a negative vote against the proposition in its entirety. To vote against laying on the table is to give support to it, which in its present shape parties may not desire, myself included in the number.

Mr. STEWART. It does not prevent any Senator from offering another one, if he so desires.

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

Mr. STEWART. That may be done ad libitum.

Mr. BACON. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. Of course it is in the power of the Senator from Rhode Island to insist upon his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ALDRICH. I renew the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Rhode Island allow me for a second?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have yielded to everybody else. So I will yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. It is only for a second. I desire to answer the Senator from Minnesota. There are quite a number of Senators who desire to vote directly upon the committee amendment. I am perfectly content that they shall have that opportunity. In voting on that proposition, I shall vote to lay it upon the table, because I intend to offer immediately afterwards the amendment which I have proposed; and when I offer it in that form, then it will be open for amendment, and the question can come properly between a half and a fourth. Therefore by this method the Senator from Minnesota will have perfect opportunity to dispose of the matter as he desires, as will every other Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Under those circumstances, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. I renew the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to lay on the table the amendment of the committee numbered 177.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAFFERY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I am not advised how he would vote on this question.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will state that my colleague [Mr. BURROWS] would vote "yea."

Mr. CAFFERY. Am I assured that he would vote "yea?"

Mr. GEAR. His colleague says so.

Mr. CAFFERY. Then I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I have an impression that he told me he is against the pending amendment to the bill. If any Senator knows differently—

Mr. ALDRICH. The senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] told me that he was paired upon this bill with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. CULLOM. Then I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BERRY. Do I understand the Senator from Rhode Island to state that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] is paired on all questions as to this bill with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Delaware told me to that effect—that he was opposed to the amendment and was paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. GORMAN. On all phases of the bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. I want to be sure that I am at liberty to vote.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Illinois has a perfect right to vote.

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY]. As I observe that he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLAY. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] that I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and that we transfer our pairs and both vote.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well. I will make the transfer as suggested. I vote "yea."

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. ALLEN (when Mr. TURNER's name was called). The junior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] is paired on this question with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired for the day with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. It has been suggested to me to transfer my pair, so that the junior Senator from Washington may stand paired with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If that is agreeable, I will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAY. My pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] having been transferred to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY], I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. When I voted I did not observe that he was absent from the Chamber. I will take the liberty of transferring my pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SEWELL. I was requested by the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] to announce that he is absent from the Chamber on account of sickness.

Mr. MANTLE. I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I do not observe him in the Chamber, and so I withhold my vote.

Mr. PERKINS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH]. I supposed he was in the Chamber when I voted. I will therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. PASCO. I suggest to the Senator from California that he and I transfer our pairs.

Mr. PERKINS. That will be very satisfactory to me, and I will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. PASCO. Then the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON] will stand paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. Has he voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DANIEL. I will say to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE] that if the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MANTLE. I understand the senior Senator from Virginia to say that his colleague, if present, would vote "nay." I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE]. The Senator from Virginia, if present, would vote "nay." I transfer my pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 27; as follows:

So amendment No. 177 was laid on the table.

Mr. GORMAN. Now, according to the understanding, I move to insert the amendment which is at the desk. It is not necessary to have it read. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LINDSAY. The amendment now is an original amendment and open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. LINDSAY. I move to amend it by inserting, in line 9, page 2, the words "for the receipts for the transportation of persons or freight from one point to another in the same State or," which will exclude from the operation of gross receipts the tax upon commerce strictly intrastate.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust, in view of the adjustment which has been made, that my amendment can be voted on without amendment. It leaves the bill open then for any Senator to offer an amendment of any sort or description. By the consent agreement I think we are entitled to vote upon this amendment direct. That is the way I understood the arrangement. If this is voted down, the proposition, as suggested by some Senators, to make the rate one-quarter of 1 per cent can be voted on, and we can come to a direct vote on that proposition.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, there is one serious objection to the amendment which I see. I should like to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Maryland in view of the fact that the committee amendment has been laid on the table, but I do not understand the policy of imposing a tax on gross receipts of these corporations over $250,000. That is as I understand the amendment. If the gross receipts of a corporation are over $250,000, you may then tax all the receipts.

Mr. BERRY. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the Senator from Maryland has modified the amendment in that respect.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad to know it. The modification does not appear upon the face of the amendment.

Mr. BERRY. It was modified, however.

Mr. ALLEN. I felt very strongly that there would be some question about the constitutionality of a law of that kind. I think it would be a discrimination which the courts would not permit to stand.

While I am on my feet, I desire to drop another observation. I have not been known in this Chamber as very friendly to the domination of corporations. I do believe in justice to corporations as well as individuals, and I do not know why this amendment is not broad enough to make every interest and every individual in the United States pay a just and equitable portion of the public burden. The associations that are engaged in the same line of business as corporations should be taxed. There is no reason why they should not be taxed, nor is there any reason why the corporations doing a business of less than $250,000 should not be required to pay a proportion of the public taxation to support this war.

I think the bill ought to reach every taxable interest, whether individual, association, or corporation. It ought to rest with equal force and justice upon all the property in the country, whether it be in the form of corporations or in some other form. I have not heard the Senator from Maryland state just why he has fixed the limit of $250,000. It is said that we have corporations organized for pecuniary profit in the United States amounting to about 800,000 at this time. The great majority of those corporations, of course, are properly reckoned small in comparison with some of the great transcontinental railways or steamship companies or other like organizations. Why should not those corporations be included in the bill, and why should they not be required to pay an equitable part of the money to be raised by taxation with which to conduct the war?

If a corporation is making $150,000 on its gross receipts, or $100,000, or even $5,000, or $20,000, or whatever sum it may be, there is no reason why that corporation or that individual should not pay, according to what it or he holds, a reasonable sum, a fair proportion in comparison with all other money to be raised by taxation. I do not believe in discrimination. As I believe the benefits of government should come to the humblest citizen in the land as freely and fully as they may be extended to the highest, so I believe also that the duty of paying money in the form of public taxation should be borne equitably and justly by the most humble as well as by the most exalted.

The difficulty with our taxation heretofore has been—and it is manifest in every tariff act we have, in every scheme and form of Congressional taxation—that we tax to the utmost those who are least able to bear the burdens of taxation, and we permit the other interests to escape their just proportion of taxation.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, when the income tax was decided, the decision made a very great difficulty in levying taxes by the United States in a way which should avoid that decision. The committee, in framing this taxation, realizing the difficulties which existed, chose a system of taxation which is not liable, as they think, to question—that is, until they come to this controverted tax. That system was a tax by stamps. It raises no constitutional question. It is self-executing. It does away with all espionage. It does not require an army of taxgatherers to investigate the books of the business corporations, firms, and persons of the country.

The difficulty with this proposition is the same as was the difficulty with the proposition of the committee which was laid on the table. It is open to doubt; it is open to question. I take it that it is a choice between these two systems of raising taxation. If this prevails, what has been reported by the committee previous to this, I suppose, is to be abandoned. The committee propose to levy a tax by stamping the receipts of the corporations and the individuals which are referred to in the pending amendment. Both can not stand. Now, which is the best? We believe that the amendment agreed to by the committee, in the first place, to raise the money by stamp duties is the best for the reasons that I have named. It avoids legal questions, it is easily collected, and really reaches all the people of the country.

Now, Mr. President, what is this proposition? Will the Senator from Maryland tell us what kind of a tax it is? Is it a tax upon corporations? Is it a tax upon individuals? Is it a tax upon firms? It can not be a tax upon business, because it is said that it is a special annual excise tax upon corporations, persons, and firms. It is a tax unheard of before in the United States. It is talked about here as if it were a tax upon business, as if it were a tax upon gross receipts, but it is not.

Mr. DANIEL. It is in the exact language of the old law of 1864, and which has been published from time to time in the last thirty years. It was taken from the old law.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the Senator from Virginia is mistaken.

Mr. DANIEL. I have the law here.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator may use the phrases which were used in the old law. But however that may be, since the income-tax decision it is certainly open to question.

It is open to another question, which has not been helped by the amendment moved by the Senator from Kentucky and accepted by the Senator from Maryland. It raises the question whether it is uniform. If it is a tax upon business, then it is not a tax upon all business of the same sort. If it is a tax upon individuals engaged in business, it is not a tax upon all individuals and corporations engaged in the same business. Whether put in the form in which the amendment was introduced or in the form in which it is now presented to the Senate by the modification, it is an exemption.

It is an exemption if it be laid upon certain corporations and individuals pursuing the same business; that is to say, if a person is carrying on any of the occupations mentioned herein and has not gross receipts to the amount of $250,000, he is not to be taxed. It is an exemption of that person engaged in the same business with other persons who are taxed. It is no answer to it to say that you do not tax any persons engaged in the same business with receipts amounting to less than $250,000. If it be a tax upon business, every business of that character and that class should be taxed; otherwise it is an exemption.

The question of uniformity was not decided in the income-tax cases. The judges divided equally upon it and it was not decided for that reason. That law provided, as I remember, that persons with an income less than $4,000 should not be taxed, and that only persons should be taxed on their income over $4,000, precisely the same as is proposed in this amendment. There were various other exemptions there, and it was a question much argued in that case whether those exemptions did not lay the tax open to the charge that it was not uniform and therefore unconstitutional. As I said, upon that question the judges divided in the first opinion equally; and when the second case was brought it was decided on another ground. So that question is still open in the Supreme Court, the judges who heard the first income-tax case having divided equally upon it.

Mr. President, is it worth while to raise all these questions in this law? The committee thought it was not. They thought it was better to raise the money we needed from unquestioned sources, where there would be no difficulty in getting money, where there can be no suits and no controversy about the legality of the tax. I do not see why the method first proposed by the committee should be cast to one side and this new method, which is open to all these questions and objections, adopted in its place.

I want to say one other thing. This amendment includes two classes of business which are not specifically mentioned in the amendment which preceded it. Those are the persons engaged in the refining of oil, whether it be the Standard Oil or other independent refiners, and those who are engaged in the business of refining sugar, whether it be the American Sugar Refining Company or independent refiners. Those classes of business, I suppose, were introduced because the Standard Oil Company is a great corporation and the American Sugar Refining Company is a great corporation, and because both of them are supposed to make a great deal of money.

But, Mr. President, if this tax is imposed, it will not be paid finally and ultimately either by the Standard Oil Company and other oil refiners or by the American Sugar Refining Company and other sugar-refining companies. They can put the burden upon the consumer. If they are monopolies, then, as Judge Cooley says in his work on Taxation, they put the burden on the consumer. We put this half of 1 per cent of the gross receipts of the Standard Oil Company upon the company to pay, and they simply need to raise their rates for oil. So with the American Sugar Refining Company; they simply need to charge a little more for their sugar. If it is the intention by this amendment to hit those two great corporations, it utterly fails. In the one instance it will be a tax upon the poor man's light, and in the other a tax upon the poor man's sugar.

Mr. President, it seems to me there is no reason why the system of the committee should be abandoned for the plan which is here proposed.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary has not yet reported the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "amount," in line 9, page 2, insert the words "for the receipts for the transportation of persons or freight from one point to another in the same State or;" so that if amended the proviso would read:

Provided, That the assessment hereby made shall not include any amount for the receipts for the transportation of persons or freight from one point to another in the same State or for the receipts for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails between the United States and any foreign port, etc.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate but a moment. The provision upon which the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is based is section 103 of the old revenue law, which I ask may be inserted as part of my remarks.

The section referred to is as follows:

RAILROADS, STEAMBOATS, FERRYBOATS, AND BRIDGES.

SEC. 103. And be it further enacted, That every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing or having the care or management of any railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel, or any stagecoach or other vehicle engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or property for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, or any canal the water of which is used for mining purposes, shall be subject to and pay a duty of 2½ per cent upon the gross receipts of such railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel, or such stagecoach or other vehicle: Provided, That the duty hereby imposed shall not be charged upon receipts for the transportation of persons or property, or mails, between the United States and any foreign port; and any person or persons, firms, companies, or corporations owning, possessing, or having the care or management of any toll road, ferry, or bridge authorized by law to receive toll for the transit of passengers, beasts, carriages, teams, and freight of any description over such toll road, ferry, or bridge shall be subject to pay a duty of 3 per cent on the gross amount of all their receipts of every description. But when the gross receipts of any such bridge or toll road shall not exceed the amount necessarily expended to keep such bridge or road in repair, no tax shall be imposed on such receipts: Provided, That all such persons, companies, and corporations shall have the right to add the duty or tax imposed hereby to their rates of fare whenever their liability thereto may commence, any limitations which may exist by law or by agreement with any person or company which may have paid or be liable to pay such fare to the contrary notwithstanding. (Act approved June 30, 1864.)

Mr. WHITE. This citation shows that there is no novelty in this proposition as far as principle is concerned; there is nothing remarkable about it; it is no creation of a mind anxious to inflict injury upon corporations or upon any other interest; it is just, equitable, honest.

Nor is the amendment directed—as one would suppose from certain remarks made here—against corporations. It is general. It is uniform, consistent. But in order to meet the criticisms which have been made, and which have had much weight with certain Senators and will perhaps influence votes, a provision was inserted in the amendment exempting $250,000 gross receipts.

It was said that the law required absolute and technical fairness as to corporations, associations, partnerships, companies, and individuals, and that all or none should benefit from the $250,000 gross receipt exemption. Responding to that intimation, and to eliminate all possible legal controversy and to make litigation harmless, the Senator from Maryland has suggested a $250,000 exemption.

We are told that we can not exempt at all. First it is said it is cruel to tax great financial institutions because small affairs must be included within the tax. Such tears are shed by corporation friends in the garb of poverty. Therefore we are urged to vote to exempt all, great and small. The danger of interference with moderate means must, it is said, absolve millionaires. Then, as it is unconstitutional (as we are informed) to exempt those who ought not to be taxed, we can not afford to extend the burden.

Thus it follows that the consumers, who have often been referred to in this debate, must pay all war taxes, because it is the law (so we are told) that the Congress of the United States is impotent to shield them from this unfair burden. Our corporation friends say that, while they are anxious that all the people of this country should contribute to the expense of this war, we can not constitutionally, though we ought to conscientiously, tax anyone really able to pay. What a system! How has such a plan been so long tolerated? How long can it last?

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], for whom we all have the highest respect, whose views as a lawyer are entitled to great regard, informs us that there is danger that the courts may upset the provision because of the exemption therein provided for. Pollock vs. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (157 U. S., 429, 586) in its concluding sentences declares that the justices who heard the argument were equally divided as to "whether any part of the tax, if not considered as a direct tax, is invalid for want of uniformity on either of the grounds suggested." It is by no means clear that any of the justices held views in opposition to the exemptions contained in the present bill.

The income-tax decision not only antagonized the judicial history of a century, but it outraged public sentiment and brought grief to those who believe in the law. However, no one contends that any court has ever declared against exemptions. The fear is that such a conclusion may be reached. I decline to act upon the theory that Congress has no power to make exemptions which for more than a generation have been found in numerous State and national statutes, and which in the latter aspect have passed unchallenged through one of the greatest wars of history. Before I am ready to concede the illegality of our action I demand a decision of the Supreme Court. In the face of a divided tribunal, real or alleged, on any issue, I will not yield. In the presence of a decision in no way affecting this particular subject I refuse to give up my opinion.

For my part, I do not fear a determination upon such an exemption. I am willing to chance it. As the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] well said the other day, it is time for us to ascertain whether Congress has any power on this subject. If it be true that we can not make any exemption whatever and must, in order to make our action legal, tax interests which the majority think ought to be omitted, we are indeed powerless and are forced to emancipate great interests because we desire to remit less important elements. Let us learn the powers of Congress, and if our authority has not been accurately demarked in past legislation or in the judicial history of this country, I hope we will continue the inquiry until we know its extent. The Supreme Court has discovered that its predecessors were wrong in their definition of direct taxes. How far that tribunal may go is a matter of speculation; but let us know its views, and the people can, if they are so minded, act clearly and conclusively.

Mr. President, I assert that prior to the decision in the income-tax case there was no expression with reference to the provision of the Constitution regarding uniformity of taxation in the slightest degree warranting the comments of my able friend from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

In the Head Money Cases (112 U. S., 590) the Supreme Court of the United States said:

The uniformity here prescribed has reference to the various localities in which the tax is intended to operate. "It shall be uniform throughout the United States." Is the tax on tobacco void because in many of the States no tobacco is raised or manufactured? Is the tax on distilled spirits void because a few States pay three-fourths of the revenue arising from it?

The tax is uniform when it operates with the same force and effect in every place where the subject of it is found. The tax in this case, which, as far as it can be called a tax, is an excise duty on the business of bringing passengers from foreign countries into this by ocean navigation, is uniform and operates precisely alike in every port of the United States where such passengers can be landed, etc.

Mr. President, without projecting anything into this debate in the nature of an elaborate legal argument, I am willing to rest upon the proposition that, the courts not having decided otherwise, we are authorized to insist that Congress has the power which I am now willing and attempting to exercise and which is relied upon in the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. But if there be a doubt upon this subject, the matter is of paramount and continuing importance, of a character adequate to involve—and which well may involve—the well-being of this country. Were I to aid in making a statute which I knew might be subjected to judicial scrutiny and decision, this would not compel me to refuse a vote in line with my views, although my opinions might be overthrown by a second income-tax decision. I yield unhesitatingly to courts of competent jurisdiction, but this I do after judgment.

Mr. President, it is not a fact that the proposals of certain Senators with reference to a stamp tax will cover this whole subject. The stamp tax does not reach oil or sugar refiners or the myriad horde of unnamed monopolies.

Senators, you will be compelled to vote, if the amendment of the Senator from Maryland is defeated, upon another amendment which I have in my desk, which will baldly and squarely present the question whether the great interests referred to by the Senator from Connecticut, the oil-refining and sugar-refining industries, are to be guaranteed immunity from taxation. The only argument made against taxation in these cases is that the consumer will finally pay the burden. This suggestion emanates from those who have always denied that the consumer ever pays the tax.

Mr. President, perhaps the consumer may pay some part of the tax. Possibly, and I think most likely, the excise to be imposed will be so small that it will be impossible to veneer it over the immense sum total. But I will not waste time considering this. Shall we here say that none of the great financial institutions of this country must pay a penny of war taxes because such taxes will by legend remain be thrown upon the shoulders of those with whom they are to deal?

Shall we say to those of moderate means, "We do not tax those who are above you in wealth, because the same people who are thus above you can collect taxes assessed against them from you"? Are we finally to concede that all taxes, revenue, and every other burden must come from the consumer—the less competent to pay of this Republic—and are we to say, finally, that the bill as proposed by the House was correct in that it taxed those less able to pay and should therefore become a law?

Mr. President, at least let us force great and able interests to pay their share—not more than their share—upon some basis that is fair and honest, and let us take the chances in the courts and meet the unavoidable. Let us learn the law, and while obeying it, let us, if our courts interpret it against justice, modify and change it by organic amendment, so as to comply with the demands of patriotism and right.

Mr. President, no one wishes to be unjust to corporations. Those who claim that we attempt to assess such wealth alone do not tell the truth. Equality and uniformity is, I trust, our controlling platform. The difficulty is that vast properties seek to shirk the payment of any taxes. If these interests, great or small, are ready to pay anything, let them say so. Do we ask too much? Inform us of our error and we will meet you. There is no intention to oppress. There is a determination to spread the burdens of war equitably. I am in sympathy with that view.

The vast moneyed interests of this country can not avoid the situation. They hold the purse. They ought not on that account seek to avoid taxes. We are reasonable. We are not endeavoring to make even monopolies pay the expenses of that war upon the success of which values largely depend. We ask only that the sugar refiners, the Standard Oil Company, the great corporations whose gross receipts exceed $250,000, should do something—just a little—to maintain this Government. If this bill shall deny this tax, for one I am not responsible. Shall not the mighty power of aggregate capital help us to sustain our armies and navies and maintain a nation under whose laws vast financial concerns have originated, developed, and prospered beyond example?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, as to one objection which has been raised to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland in reference to the exemption of a certain class of corporations whose receipts are less than $250,000, while I do not think there is anything serious in the objection, it occurs to me that it can be easily obviated by making this change, which I suggest to the Senator from Maryland: Strike out in line 3, on page 2, the words "whose gross annual receipts exceed $250,000" and insert in line 6 the words "on all receipts in excess of $250,000;" so that the amendment will read that every corporation must pay this tax on its gross receipts in excess of $250,000. That would give every corporation in the land the same exemption, and those corporations who had less than $250,000 would not have to pay any tax, and the constitutional objection which has been made against it, though I think it is not good, would be entirely obviated.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Maryland has already modified the amendment in that way.

Mr. GORMAN. I have modified the amendment to that extent, so that the amendment stands with the exemption precisely as the Senator has suggested.

Mr. NELSON. I shall move at the proper time, after the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] has been disposed of, to reduce the tax from one-half to one-fourth of 1 per cent. I think that large enough.

It may seem ungracious, Mr. President, to criticize the action of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber in reference to this bill, but there is one feature of the bill which I think does more violence to the principle of equality than any other provision in it. It is that portion of the bill which provides for the stamp tax of 1 cent on a bill of lading. There is no more unequal tax in the whole bill. A bill of lading may cover an entire train load. A firm of lumbermen, manufacturers of salt, or coal dealers may ship an entire train load of their supplies in one bill of lading, and the tax will be just 1 cent.

A poor country merchant, whose little stock of groceries is short, and who needs a box of crackers, or who needs a box of soap, or perhaps a barrel of sugar to replenish his stock, is required to pay a cent on the bill of lading for those articles; and the tax is just as much on a box of soap or a box of crackers or a box of candy as on a whole carload. Can there be anything more unequal and unfair in the whole realm of taxation than that? It strikes me that the fair and just and equitable way would be to eliminate that stamp tax, and in place of it have this tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent.

I am surprised at the criticism made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] on the gross-earnings tax. That kind of a tax is not a novelty in this country. We have had it for years in the State of Minnesota, they have it in the State of Wisconsin, and they have it in many other States; and, as a matter of fact, the railroads prefer it. In my State they pay a tax of 3 per cent on gross earnings in lieu of all other taxes. There is no assessment about it. The assessor does not have to go around and assess the rolling stock, the station grounds, and the terminals, but the company pays a gross sum on their earnings; it goes into the treasury for the benefit of all, and it has worked well.

I am surprised also at the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY]. The railroads have always contended that that tax within the State should be limited to business within the State; that is, that the States have no right to levy a tax on gross receipts except on traffic wholly within the State. That has been the contention of the railroads all along. If there is any part of the transportation business that is peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government it is traffic and commerce between the several States. If you eliminate that out of this amendment, you emasculate all the force and all the vigor there is in it.

Mr. SPOONER. The State traffic is exempt from Federal taxation.

Mr. NELSON. Perhaps I am mistaken about that.

Mr. SPOONER. That objection is obviated in the amendment. Mr. NELSON. Then, Mr. President, I misunderstood the amendment as it was read.

Mr. SPOONER. The amendment leaves subject to State taxation earnings within the State.

Mr. NELSON. Assuming that that is so, the amendment, taking it even in that view of the case, would involve an endless amount of bookkeeping; it would involve complications wholly unnecessary; it would involve the necessity of the companies keeping a separate and distinct account of the transportation business within the several States and the transportation business between the States; whereas if you put the tax on the entire business it would be fair and just.

I was opposed to the amendment of the bill which included all kinds of corporations, manufacturing corporations, and all those little matters in which farmers are interested, in country elevators, creameries, cheese factories, country stores, and all that. To tax those corporations would be an invidious distinction, because there are many farmers and individuals engaged in the like business.

But in reference to the particular class of business covered by this amendment, transportation by railroad, the telegraph business, the telephone business, the great oil companies, and the sugar-refining companies are branches of business which are carried on by corporations; and their business does not enter into competition, as is the case with private business. Hence it is a just and fair tax, and it operates fairly on a class of business that can well stand it.

Senators have said that the tax comes out of the consumer. Mr. President, I can not conceive of a tax in this whole bill which does not ultimately come out of the consumer. I pay a tax every time I take a glass of beer; I pay a tax every time I smoke a cigar; I pay a tax if I should chew a little tobacco. Every time a poor man has to give a note to pay a debt he has to pay a tax; every time he gives a mortgage he has to pay a tax. There is not a single instance in this whole bill in which the tax does not ultimately come out of the poor fellow, if you please, the consumer, or the person who can least stand it.

The criticism which has been made against this bill that the tax ultimately comes out of the consumer is a criticism that applies to every line and portion of the bill. So long as we have got to resort to taxation, if we reduce it to a moderate figure, I can conceive of no system of taxation which is more fair and just. It is true, in the first instance, the railroads will have to pay the tax, but ultimately it will come out of the American people; and the American people have no objection to paying this tax indirectly through the railroads and transportation companies.

After the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky shall have been disposed of, I shall propose to move to reduce this tax to one-fourth of 1 per cent; and then I shall vote for the amendment if that carries. Then I hope that portion of the bill which places a tax of 1 cent on every bill of lading may be stricken out, because I regard that tax as the most unequal and disproportionate to be found in any feature of the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not understand that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] had been disposed of.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It has not been.

Mr. ALLEN. I thought the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] stated that it had been disposed of.

I can not understand the force of the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. It certainly was not offered because Congress lacks the power to impose a tax upon the gross earnings of a corporation in a State. I know of no reason why those gross earnings should not bear their portion of the tax to be collected from the people by virtue of the provisions of this bill.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] a few moments ago spoke of the last decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the income tax as modifying to some considerable extent the power of Congress to tax. That suggested to me, Mr. President—what I have never heard discussed in the Senate, but which I have heard discussed elsewhere quite fully—this thought: That we are given altogether too much in framing our legislation to avoiding some prospective decision of the Supreme Court.

I think it is our duty to follow out the Constitution as we understand it, and to impose a just and equitable tax upon every interest that is properly taxable, and let the Supreme Court or any other organization having to deal with the question determine the question for themselves. We should not play a game of hide and seek with the Supreme Court and try by artful phrases to avoid some contemplated or possible decision of theirs.

I have no doubt that if the Constitution of the United States were absolutely silent on the question of taxation, if there were not a letter or a syllable or a sentence in the Constitution respecting taxation, we would have unlimited power to tax. It is inconceivable that you can have a Government such as we have, with all the ramifications of governmental agencies, where money is indispensable to conduct that Government without it having either the express or incontrovertible implied authority to raise the necessary money by proper methods of taxation, for the inability to raise money would be destructive of the Government itself, and, therefore, destructive of the great scheme marked out in the Constitution for our National Government.

The authority to tax is an authority that can not be denied; and in the nature of things it must be a power that knows no limit excepting the limit of necessity. If this Government has a right to exist, and must exist by raising revenue, then it must have the power to lay its hands upon the property and money of the citizen to that end; it must have the power to lay its hands upon the property and the money within its jurisdiction to the full extent necessary and proper to conduct its affairs, even though that necessity carries it to the extent of absolute confiscation, in some instances, when it becomes necessary.

Mr. President, to extend taxation to what might be conceived an almost unlimited extent to support and conduct the affairs of the Government the Government must have unquestioned power to reach out its arms to that extent and seize the property and money within its territorial jurisdiction. You might as well say, sir, that a human being can live without breathing as to say that a government can exist and conduct its affairs without the unlimited power of taxation.

I admit, Mr. President, that we can by constitutional provision and by statutory provisions restrict ourselves if we will. But such a restriction recognizes the existence of the power in the first instance; but where there has been no restriction, where the Government does not restrict itself, we can not say what is contained in the Constitution in language alone is necessarily a limitation upon the power to tax.

I do not know that this discussion is very germane to the pending amendment, but I think it is important. Year by year we are restricting the taxing power of this Government; and if we go on a few more years as we have gone on for the past few years, we shall possibly reach a time when we shall be unable constitutionally to raise the necessary money by taxation to conduct the affairs of the Government.

It ought to be understood in Congress and among all classes of our people that the public weal rises high above all individual interests; and the Government, having a right to take the lives of its citizens by enlisting and forcing them to serve in the Army and in the Navy, has a right to take every dollar of their property, in the proper methods, if necessary to conduct its affairs. I can not myself conceive of any permanent limitation upon that power.

Mr. LINDSAY. This amendment differs from the amendment offered by the majority of the Committee on Finance in this, that amendment proposed to tax the franchises of certain corporations, and it was discussed in that view. This amendment avoids that difficulty, and proposes to tax transportation, to tax "any firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing or having the care or management of any railroad, street railroad, sleeping car, steamboat, ship, or other vessel, engaged or employed in commerce." It is a tax upon commerce, as transportation is commerce.

Under the constitutional grant to the Federal Government of the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, it has always been held that a State could enact no law which would operate to tax commerce between the States. The books are full of cases in which such enactments have been declared void, because in the opinion of the courts of the Federal Government they operated to tax commerce between the States.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator if the Supreme Court of the United States and the subordinate Federal courts have not held, in substance, that you can not, under the form of taxation, levy a tax or levy a burden upon interstate commerce which will have the effect of hampering or restricting it; but have they ever held that you can not impose a reasonable and just tax upon interstate commerce?

Mr. LINDSAY. The Federal courts have held that the power to regulate interstate commerce is exclusively in the Federal Government, and that any tax which operates as a tax upon interstate commerce is contrary to the grant of power to the Federal Government. Therefore the question does not arise as to whether or not the tax hampers commerce between the States. It is the want of power in the States and not the effect of State taxation upon commerce.

The State of Wisconsin has been used as an illustration. The State of Wisconsin levies a tax upon the gross incomes of transportation companies operating in the State of Wisconsin; but the State is confined to the gross income arising from business originating in and terminating, so far as the transportation is concerned, in the State of Wisconsin, and that limitation is put upon the estimates of the gross income or gross profits or gross receipts in order to avoid the constitutional disability of taxing the gross receipts arising out of interstate commerce.

There never has been any grant to the Federal Government to regulate commerce purely domestic to a State. The original power to regulate commerce purely domestic resides in the State, because that power has never been delegated to the General Government, but has been reserved to the States.

When we came to frame our Interstate Commerce Commission act and to delegate to that commission such power over transportation as it was proper for it to have, we carefully limited its right to interfere with commerce interstate in its character, and excluded from it the right to interfere at all with commerce purely domestic to the several States.

A tax upon gross incomes or gross receipts is a tax upon transportation. But I do not believe that Congress has the power—and I am not willing for Congress to do it—to tax every citizen of my State who ships his produce to market in my State, never at all going outside of the State. Why should the tobacco raiser in Owen County be taxed when he ships his tobacco from Owen County to the city of Louisville to be sold in the market, never for a moment carrying it outside of the territorial limits of the State at all?

I protest against the attempt by Congress to exercise the power to tax transportation purely within the State; and it was for the purpose of cutting off this attempt to tax purely intrastate commerce that I offered the amendment.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORMAN. I am not a lawyer, and I should like to have the benefit of the Senator's opinion. Where does he find the power to impose a tax of 12 cents a pound on tobacco which is raised in Kentucky, manufactured in Kentucky, sold in Kentucky, and consumed in Kentucky, as is done by this bill?

Mr. LINDSAY. The tax upon the manufacturer is purely an excise tax levied upon the business, and it is not a tax upon commerce at all; it is not a tax upon transportation.

Mr. DANIEL. On what is the tax—the sale?

Mr. LINDSAY. The tax on the sale is a tax on the party who engages in the sale of it.

Mr. DANIEL. Is that a tax on commerce?

Mr. LINDSAY. It is on trade as contradistinguished from transportation. Trade and commerce are different.

These are my reasons for insisting on the amendment; but as the Senator from Maryland desires to have his amendment voted upon unembarrassed by this amendment, and as I will have the right to offer it in the Senate in case his amendment be adopted, with that understanding I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. GORMAN. I am obliged to the Senator. Now I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. HALE. Let me call the Senator's attention to the close of his amendment on page 3, and ask him whether he has cared for the penalty in the proper way? His amendment reads:

Any person failing or refusing to make return as aforesaid, or who shall make a false or fraudulent return, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000 for each and every false or fraudulent return.

Should he not have used the words "failure or refusal to make return as aforesaid?" As the language now stands, the penalty only applies to the making of a false or fraudulent return. It strikes me that such a modification should be made.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] has proposed an amendment in reference to that identical subject. I do not know whether it covers the phraseology used by the Senator from Maine, but an attempt is made to cover it by the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SPOONER. The point made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was evidently well made. The Senator's motion has not embraced that. Failing or refusing to make a return and making a false return are two separate offenses.

Mr. GORMAN. They are.

Mr. HALE. He does not make the penalty apply to anything but the false or fraudulent return. If he will add the words "failure or refusal to make return as aforesaid," then he will cover both.

Mr. ALLISON. That is right.

Mr. NELSON. I understand the Senator from Kentucky has withdrawn his amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has.

Mr. NELSON. Then I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator wait a moment until the amendment is perfected?

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

Mr. GORMAN. In line 5, page 3, after the word "for," I move to insert "any such failure or refusal to make return as aforesaid, or for."

Mr. HALE. Yes; that would seem to make it complete.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "for," in line 5, page 3 of the amendment, it is proposed to insert "any such failure or refusal to make return as aforesaid, or for."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be thus modified.

Mr. NELSON. I move to strike out, in line 5, page 2 of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland the words "one-half" and insert "one-fourth;" so as to reduce the tax to one-quarter of 1 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the words "one-half" and insert "one-fourth;" so as to read "one-fourth of 1 per centum."

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, this amendment with slight amendments would be quite acceptable to me. I wish to congratulate the Senator from Maryland upon selecting those corporations for the tax the best able to bear it of all the corporations in this country. Nearly every one of them is a monopoly. Nearly every one of them is so situated that it can better bear the tax than any other organization we have, or any other people we have, for that matter. In the first place, this tax of one-half of 1 per cent is levied upon railroads. It is well known that nearly every one of them is in a combination to maintain rates. It is well known that their rates are to-day where they were in 1890, although it is equally well known that the price of every other service has very much declined since that time. In addition to that, we tax the telegraph companies, telephone companies, electric-light companies, etc., most of whom are so situated that they are absolute monopolies and free from competition.

Mr. WILSON. Is there any tax on the manufacture of steel rails—a trust?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator from Washington asks if there is any tax on the manufacture of steel rails. I believe not. It seems that one monopoly has escaped.

Mr. WILSON. Where is that monopoly located?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Those which have been selected have been carefully selected so as to cover the principal monopolies in this country.

The next item of taxation is upon corporations engaged in refining petroleum or refining sugar or owning or controlling pipe lines, absolute monopolies, trusts, combinations to maintain prices. So there is little question but that the statement made by the Senator from Connecticut is true, that in the end it must be paid by the consumer. It would be too bad to have any provision in the bill which lays a burden upon anybody else but the consumer, upon the individual. Nine per cent of our population own 71 per cent of the property of this country. Ninety-one per cent of our population own 99 per cent of the property of this country, and therefore the bill ought to have no provision that does not carefully lay every burden possible to lay upon the people who have no property and allow those to escape entirely who have most of the property. However, with an amendment which shall provide for striking out line 3 and two words in line 4, I think I should vote for the amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. I ask the Senator to yield to me that I may make a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business. It seems to me that the matter can not be disposed of to-night, from the way the Senator from South Dakota is starting out, and I should like to have an executive session. I make that motion, with the consent of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the Senate desires to go into executive session, I shall not object. Otherwise I shall go on.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the Senator from South Dakota put in his amendment.

Mr. GORMAN. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will not make that motion now. We ought to vote upon the amendment. We have finished one branch of it, and it will accommodate Senators who want a direct vote on the amendment. I thought it was understood that after the last vote we should proceed to a direct vote upon this proposition, and I trust it will be done.

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me, I do not think, from the way the Senator from South Dakota is starting out, that we shall get any vote on the amendment this afternoon, and I should like to have an executive session. Besides, we can all think about the nature of the amendment. It is very important. I want to think of it over night myself.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield to a motion for an executive session.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will offer his amendment.

Mr. MASON. I desire, if it is proper, to make a motion that when we adjourn to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will withhold that motion for the present.

Mr. MASON. I do not want to make the motion if I am not privileged to make it, but I wish to give notice that I intend to ask for action upon that question.

Mr. CHANDLER. The best thought in the Senate is not ready to have the motion made at the present moment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move, then, to strike out line 3, page 2 of the amendment, and the words "thousand dollars," in line 4; so that all corporations shall be taxed upon their entire receipts.

Mr. BERRY. One amendment is already pending, and the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota was requested to offer his amendments so that they could be printed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That will necessitate another amendment, as to the provision that all receipts less than $250,000 shall be exempt. The reason why I offer the amendment is this: Here is a corporation receiving $1,000,000 a year, and it immediately creates four corporations which will pay no tax. There is no trouble to do it at all and thus save $5,000. Here is the sugar trust, owning mills all over the country. It will immediately resolve itself into innumerable corporations—it is simply a mere matter of book-keeping—and escape every dollar of the tax.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's amendment will be printed. The amendment pending is the one offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. ELKINS. I have made a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yielded only for a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator from South Dakota yielded for that purpose.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me to present a conference report?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield for that purpose.

QUARTERMASTER'S SUPPLIES.

Mr. PROCTOR. I submit a conference report which has once been read, but which was recalled to correct a clerical error.

The report was read, and agreed to, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10121) to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 9, 10, and 11.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 14, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of said amendment strike out the word "sixth" and insert in lieu thereof the word "third;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of said amendment, as a new paragraph, the following:

"And be it further enacted, That during the existing war the Bureau of Ordnance of the War Department is authorized to purchase, without advertisement, such ordnance and ordnance stores as are needed for immediate use, and when such ordnance and ordnance stores are to be manufactured then to make contracts, without advertisement, for such stores to be delivered as rapidly as manufactured."

ADJOURNMENT TO TUESDAY.

Mr. MASON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Illinois. I hope there may be an agreement to have a vote on the pending amendment to the revenue bill. There are reasons, which will be apparent to every Senator, why the Senate should express itself on this amendment. If it should be adopted, of course it becomes a part of the text of the bill, and amendments to it can be offered hereafter. There will be no difficulty about that. The whole question will be open. It will make it a much easier matter, it seems to me, for the Finance Committee to determine just what course shall be pursued with regard to other things, to understand what the Senate will do in regard to this particular amendment. I hope Senators will withdraw conflicting motions and allow a vote on the amendment.

Mr. MASON. My motion is not to adjourn or go into executive session. It will take only a minute to dispose of it. It is simply that when we adjourn we will adjourn until Tuesday. There are reasons why the country should know that we are not at work on Decoration Day.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator can renew the motion after a vote on the amendment, and I hope he will do so.

Mr. MASON. If I thought we would vote on the amendment this evening, I would yield. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] did not yield the floor for that purpose. He yielded the floor, first, for an executive session, and then for a conference report.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understand. I was asking unanimous consent that this be done, as we have reached a point where we can have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. MASON. I do not think there will be a call of the yeas and nays on the motion I make.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It will take but a little time to settle that matter after the other question is disposed of.

Mr. MASON. I desire to be accommodating. The Senator knows I have been waiting in my seat all day to be heard for a few minutes on an amendment which I propose to offer to the bill, and while I have the floor I desire to give notice that on Tuesday, after the morning hour, I desire to be heard briefly on the amendment which I have been endeavoring to present to the Senate for several weeks.

Mr. QUAY. Do I understand the Senator from Arkansas to say that a vote can be had immediately upon the pending amendment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is what I was proposing. I think it can be had. I hope it can. The gentlemen who want to change the amendment can, if it should be adopted by the Senate and become a part of the bill, hereafter propose such changes as they wish to make. It does not cut off anybody. It seems to me it would be well to understand what the action of the Senate will be upon the pending amendment.

Mr. MASON. I have no objection, the Senator will understand, to taking a vote now.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then I ask unanimous consent that we shall have a vote at once on the amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to make an inquiry. I desire to know whether, after the amendment is voted on, if it is adopted, we can move to amend it as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; but it can be done in the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should object to any such understanding as that.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is what I supposed.

Mr. ALDRICH. It can be done in the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. After the bill is completed as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. But not as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No; technically it could not, I presume.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The amendment, so far as I am concerned, is decidedly unsatisfactory in its present form. It leaves the door open for every sort of fraud and every chance in the world to evade the tax, and these corporations, whether they earn $100,000 or $1,000,000, are a class of corporations which ought to be taxed if we tax anybody at all.

Mr. MASON. I should like to have my motion put. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that motion will not be agreed to. We have certainly—

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is a motion to adjourn to a day certain debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to occupy only a moment's time. We have made very little progress with the bill during the week, and I think the necessities of the situation require that the bill shall be disposed of at an early day. There are several reasons why this should be done. Every day's delay in the passage of the bill remits that amount of taxes to those who are now manufacturing and producing, as stocks on hand are exempted. I should be willing, if we could have some arrangement as to when the bill shall be disposed of, to consider more favorably the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, but I am perfectly certain, in my own mind, that if we now adjourn over until Tuesday, we shall find ourselves adjourning from next Saturday until Monday with the bill still undisposed of. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable, but the Chair will hear the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. COCKRELL. How, then, was the Senator from Iowa heard?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Because the Chair decided that it was debatable. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Chair reverse itself?

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to say what I have said. [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. I desire to say one word out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. MASON. I so understood the rule and do now, but I did not want to be particular. It is true that there will be some remission of taxes, but it will be to American people and American manufacturers. There is no great hurry about the passage of the pending revenue bill. The revenues are sufficient for the day and for the week; and if there ever was a time in the history of this country when this body, which is an alleged dignified body, ought to pay some respect and consideration to the soldiers of the country, it is next Monday.

I hope that the Senator will not ask for a roll call, because we are anxious to pass the revenue bill and the time that he wastes in the roll call could be used in passing or voting upon some amendment to that bill. There is no objection to working to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. COCKRELL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I merely desire to state that a number of gentlemen in this Chamber have engagements for next Monday in connection with Decoration Day exercises which they will consider it their imperative duty to keep. I do not think the country would lose anything by one day.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, let us have the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine objects to further debate, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAFFERY (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MANTLE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I shall refrain from voting.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], but I shall break the pair on this occasion, and vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who is absent from the Chamber; but I am informed that if present he would vote "nay." I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). As by the previous arrangement, I announce the pair of the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAY (after having voted in the negative). I desire to ask if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. CLAY. I will withdraw my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that we exchange our pairs. I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. We seem to be on opposite sides upon this question.

Mr. CLAY. I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I vote "yea."

Mr. CLAY. I will let my vote stand.

Mr. McLAURIN. As this is merely a question relative to adjournment, I will break my pair and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 31; as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 31, 1898.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Forasmuch as it hath pleased Thee, Almighty God, to take out of this world the soul of England's great commoner, we, with his brethren and countrymen, join in the solemn service of committing his body to the ground, in sure faith and blessed hope, through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, of resurrection and eternal life. A son of Adam, and therefore with limitations and shortcomings, he nevertheless walked among us the noblest person of our time, great in his gifts, greater in the use he made of them, greatest of all in his close following in the steps of our Divine Master, who, when He was reviled, reviled not again, when He suffered He threatened not, but committed Himself unto Him that judgeth righteously.

We bless Thee, O Almighty God, for this great and sacred life, example, and influence; and pray that its inspiration may enter into the whole region not only of his native land and its dependencies, but throughout our own vast nation, moving us to nobler, holier life and aspirations. Let Thy blessing be upon the wife who for well-nigh threescore years was the companion and helpmeet for such a man, and upon his children, heirs to such a glorious name and fame.

We pray, O Lord, that we may order our walk and conversation in such wise that we, too, in approaching the last solemn hour of earth, may be calm, steadfast, strong, victorious over pain and grief, and so enter into the everlasting life which Thou hast prepared for them who love Thee. Through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the prayer of the Chaplain this morning be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The order is made. The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last will be read.

On motion of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was dispensed with.

WAR REVENUE BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business appears to be closed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the revenue bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 10100, to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I have waited a long time to present a matter of an amendment which I propose to the pending bill. During the time of waiting I have endeavored to brief the case, so that I may state it as quickly and as distinctly as possible. I am as anxious as any other member of the Senate to finish the consideration of the bill; and if I may have the attention of my colleagues, I will state the case involved in the amendment in a very short time. Without reading the amendment, which would take some little time, I will state the object and the necessity for it.

There is no civilized country in the world where the Government gives so little protection to the consumers of food and drink as in this country. I have no doubt that many will be surprised to learn, if they have time to hear me, that what is known as flour—common wheat flour—is subject to the most outrageous adulteration, and that from 75 to 80 per cent of the flour sold in the markets is adulterated flour. Some of it, to be sure, is adulterated by what is known as corn flour—the by-product of the glucose factory—and is not necessarily unhealthy or deleterious to the public health. It is, however, a fraud practiced upon the people who purchase and consume that flour as wheat flour. It is manufactured and sold in large quantities. I shall present to the Senate as briefly as possible the circulars and the evidence showing to what extent the flour is adulterated by this product. I do not claim that that adulteration is necessarily unhealthy.

There are, however, used as adulterants, which I shall show to the Senate, in the flour that 70,000,000 people eat many ingredients that are most unhealthful, and they are not only frauds upon the people, but the introduction and use of which puts a man, or ought to put him, under the shadow of the penitentiary.

I shall present to the Senate at the right time the circulars and advertisements of those distinguished Christian gentlemen who are selling hundreds of thousands of pounds of ground rock and ground white clay as adulterant for flour. I have samples, which I shall show at the proper time, of an article known as mineraline, which is sold in great quantities, and which is used not only to lighten the color of flour, but to add to its weight.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mineral what?

Mr. MASON. Mineraline. It is made of white clay.

Mr. HALE. What was the word the Senator used?

Mr. MASON. Mineraline.

Mr. WOLCOTT. "Ine."

Mr. MASON. "Ine," as though it were "mineral" and "ine." It is clay, manufactured largely, I think, in North Carolina, and is ground so that it resembles flour. I have some samples of it. I am here to make a frank statement. Without any desire to injure their business, I will say that I have used this blended flour made of wheat flour and corn, and I do not consider it unhealthful. I think it is fair to them to say that it is not absolutely unhealthful.

I believe it is not necessarily unhealthful. It is claimed by some of the evidence that has been taken before the Committee on Ways and Means that inasmuch as all of the life-giving power known as gluten is extracted from it, and the sugar is extracted, that it has no life-giving power, and that therefore it is deleterious to health. I do not make that claim, for I do not wish to do them an injustice. It is the natural product in a factory that consumes many thousands of bushels of corn daily in the State of Illinois. But as I am reminded by one of my colleagues, it contains sulphuric acid, and it is upon that basis that it is claimed it is deleterious to health.

The law of the question is perfectly plain. I have drawn my amendment placing this adulterated flour within the scope of the law exactly as oleomargarine was placed within the scope of the law. The bill itself, I should say to the members of the Senate, was drawn by the National Board of Trade; and it was brought in for the purpose, not of injuring any man's legitimate business, but for the purpose of giving notice to the people who consume flour of what they are buying when they buy it. I have taken the bill, and by direction of the Committee on Manufactures, of which I have the honor to be chairman, and under the direction of that committee, I have offered it as an amendment to this bill. It is strictly and legally a revenue bill.

Of course the main object, to be perfectly frank, can not be for revenue, any more than the oleomargarine was solely and wholly for revenue purposes. The object of the bill was, as discussed, for the purpose of obtaining at least enough revenue to more than pay the additional expense; but the main object of the bill was, first, to protect the legitimate manufacturer of wheat flour, who does not sell corn with it, or clay, or rock; second, to increase the export of American flour, which we can do, for the export trade has very materially fallen off since it has become known that we are adulterating the flour that has heretofore been exported.

The third reason, and the principal reason, why I press the bill is that the ordinary consumer of flour (and it is the staff of life; it is one of the things that every man, woman, and child partakes of) ought to have a reasonable, fair Government protection. After it is developed that such an extraordinary and unnatural adulteration is taking place in the manufacture, they should have a fair chance to know what they are buying.

The bill as originally drawn was very strict and onerous. Instead of a moderate license, as in the oleomargarine law, it provided for a license fee of $500. I have no disposition, nor had the committee from which I reported the bill as an amendment to the pending bill any disposition, to prevent the sale of blended flour, corn with wheat, but simply the disposition that when it is blended the purchaser who buys it shall have fair notice, as he does to-day when he goes to buy butter—he knows that he is not sold oleomargarine.

The question of law I hope I shall not have to discuss, although some of the distinguished Senators upon the other side have a certain fixed principle that the Government ought not to tax for the purpose of regulating. The question of ethics, of politics, may enter and be discussed, but the question of law has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, and I will refer Senators to the case, if any of you doubt the correctness of the proposition.

The Government has a perfect right to raise revenue; and having that right in the oleomargarine decisions, they had a right to raise revenue upon mixed butter or artificial butter. I think there is no complaint among the 70,000,000 people of the United States to-day that when they want oleomargarine they buy it. The tax does not add materially to its cost. I have reduced it from what seems like heavy taxation to a situation where it will produce not over possibly $500,000 more than the extra cost. I have reduced the license fee in the bill which I have offered from $500 to $10. The House bill, I believe, reduced it to $12.

The principal thing that I want to call the attention of the Senate to is this: I, or rather the committee that introduced the bill, define mixed flour to mean that food product made from wheat and mixed, blended, or compounded with ground corn or other foreign substance or with the manufactured product of any other grain than wheat.

Mr. President, if I might be allowed, I think perhaps it will take five or six minutes, I wish the Senate might hear the statement made by the men who represent the millers of the United States. Before the Committee on Manufactures we have had some millers who told us frankly that they used blended flour, but they were compelled to do it in order to compete with others in the same business. The proprietor of one mill at Kaskaskia, Ill., stated to me before the committee that he had absolutely abandoned his mill. He had a mill for the manufacture of wheat flour, but those who adulterated the flour with the use of corn flour, so called, were able by reason of the adulteration to so undersell him that he was obliged to close his mill.

This is the evidence taken on this case before the Committee on Ways and Means in the House. The hearings we have had before the Committee on Manufactures to get at the facts of the case we have had reduced to writing, and if I can be allowed about ten minutes I should like to have the millers' position stated, and I ask the Secretary to read this statement. It will not take to exceed that time.

I should state that this man, Mr. Augustine Gallagher, represents the millers' executive committee, also the Northwestern Winter Wheat Millers' Association, and he lives in St. Louis, Mo. There is a statement also by Mr. Cole, who represents the Southern Illinois Millers' Association. Both these statements were indorsed by Mr. Frank Barry, secretary of the Millers' National Association. I do not adopt, necessarily, all that is stated here, but so far as I now remember they have stated their case from the millers' standpoint, and I would be very thankful if Senators upon whom I depend to vote for this amendment will give it the attention which the position of those gentlemen seem to indicate they ought to have. The first is the statement of Mr. Gallagher, representing the National Millers' Association.

The Secretary read as follows:

MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN: I desire to speak in support of Senate bill No. 3027 and to offer some suggestions. It should be made plain at the outset that the industry I represent—wheat flour manufacturing—is not at all desirous of injuring any calling that appears to be, in the eyes of this committee and the bread eaters of this country, a legitimate business. In our advocacy of honest branding, exact weights, and a license for adulterators of wheat flour we aim no blow at any trade which is carried on legitimately. To emphasize this I wish to go on record as saying that American corn-mill products constitute the best breadstuffs in the world for their cost, which is less than one-third of the cost of wheat-mill products. Sold on their merits, corn-mill products, cornstarch always excepted, will command greater value than when used in the fraudulent manner now practiced, and there is no room to doubt that the demand for pure corn goods would, if honestly supplied, increase greatly.

Since corn milling has been brought to its present state of advancement, making the production of corn flour at a reasonable cost possible, but little effort has been made to dispose of it to consumers at its real value. On the contrary, as soon as it was demonstrated that it could be hidden from the unschooled in wheat flour, it was and has ever since been imposed upon flour consumers at about the value of wheat flour, constituting a fraud that has practically suspended pure wheat-flour milling in many sections and has cost the bread-eating public millions of dollars in overcharges.

This measure has been indorsed by the Winter Wheat Millers' League, the Southwestern Winter Wheat Millers' Association, the Millers' National Association, the Millers' State associations of Minnesota, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Kentucky, Michigan, and Pennsylvania, by jobbers of flour throughout the country, and by a majority of the corn millers in the United States. In fact, it has been approved by everyone connected with the breadstuff trade except those profiting by the practice of adulteration.

The plea commonly made by those who practice the fraud and profit greatly by it, that adulterated flour gives satisfaction and that consumers know what they are getting, should go unheeded, for it is misrepresentation of the first order. It does not give that kind of satisfaction that pure wheat flour does and consumers do not know what they are buying when they get adulterated goods which are either not branded at all or are branded with a lie. Personal investigation in Southern markets, the chief field of operation of the adulterators, has proved to me that to brand flour "corn and wheat flour mixed" renders it practically unsalable, and I know numerous millers who endeavor to meet unscrupulous competition by employing adulterants, declaring the facts in words and by the branding of their goods, and failed to sell them.

Ask any man who appears before this committee in defense of the fraud if he brands his products so that consumers may know what they are buying, and remember his answer. Ask him also if he believes it is right to charge consumers at the rate of $4.50 and $5 per barrel for corn flour worth $1.50 to $2 per barrel, or for cornstarch which is worth less. That is exactly what they do when adulterators sell the mixtures complained of. I am informed that the corn-flour combinations and cornstarch trusts intend to oppose pure-flour legislation; that they will do the pious act and claim to be making the poor man's breadstuff, while at the same time passing as the friend of the corn producer. Their appearance here should be made a noteworthy event, as their explanation of a self-evident fraud will doubtless be unique.

I have told you that the poor man's breadstuff they make costs the unfortunate consumer about three times as much as it is worth; and I desire to add and to emphasize the fact that not an adulterator in the country will admit openly and freely to the consumer of his products that he is an adulterator. The reason is not far to seek. He is ashamed and afraid to confess his guilt, for it is a disgrace in the eyes of honest men. Moreover, you can not go into a board of trade, merchants' exchange, or chamber of commerce in the country and find the adulterants complained of on sale. There is no call for them where honorable commercial transactions are conducted, and even frauds would not be seen buying them if they were to be had in the open markets. If cornstarch is a breadstuff and if flourine is a breadstuff, why are they not quoted in the breadstuff markets of the country? I tell you they are worse than worthless when employed as breadstuff, because they injure the health of consumers. You will not find these adulterants quoted in any of the newspapers, trade journals, or price currents of the land, for the reasons I have given. People who deal in them do so under cover. They constitute the dark-lantern brigade of the breadstuff trade, and should be subject to the operations of a law that will protect the breadstuff of the land, and at the same time permit American millers to maintain the high standing which they have attained in the markets of the world.

It may be well to remind you that what I have said and may yet say has no reference to corn meal. Corn meal is a wholesome breadstuff. It is sold in the open markets of the country and is an honest mill product. It can not be successfully mixed with wheat flour because it can not be hidden. A mixture of wheat flour and corn meal would not injure the consumer thereof; but no one engages in the business of mixing these products for the reason that honest men sell each one on its merit, and frauds find in the operation no opportunity to victimize their customers, and there is therefore no incentive. It is a plain case. Only those who would play the part of swindlers undertake to defend the adulteration practice.

Ask the makers of the adulterants mentioned whether or not they are shipped from the factories or mills where produced under their rightful names to purchasers. Ask them, should they have the hardihood to come before you, if they do not continually falsify bills of lading in order to carry out organized and far-reaching deception which aims at the health and the purse of the people, demoralizing honest trade at home and scandalizing honest American millers abroad.

It is asserted by those in favor of unrestricted fraud in the breadstuff business that a law compelling honest branding of flour will work a hardship on corn growers. Gentlemen and honest men would be ashamed to make such an assertion. It is an insult to the toiling millions of honest corn producers in this country to assert that their welfare depends on fraud, and the slander against King Corn is shameful. Corn producers who have given this question consideration know that the adulteration practice has in no sense benefited them. While the combinations and trusts controlling the output of adulterants have arbitrarily advanced their prices, the price of corn has declined. This is a fact, also, that if half the flour produced in the United States should be adulterated the demand for corn would not be greatly increased, while the demand for wheat would be remarkably lessened. This is evident from the fact that this country produces more than four times as much corn as wheat. But even if a cent or two per bushel were added to the limited amount of corn demanded by adulterators—in comparison to the corn product of the country—the loss sustained by the displacement of wheat, which is of much greater value, would be in the nature of a calamity to wheat and corn producers, for it rarely happens in the corn belt that a wheat grower is not a corn grower also.

On an average this country produces more than 800,000,000 bushels of wheat, of which about three-quarters is made into flour. Of late years our export flour trade averages about 15,000,000 barrels annually, having been in a recent year more than 16,000,000 barrels.

In 1890 there were more than 16,000 mills in the United States, having a value of $308,000,000. The flour mills of the country are distributed over thirty States and Territories, and besides, in their aggregate, constituting the most important manufacturing industry in the United States they form the most important commercial enterprises in the thousands of communities where located. Moreover, the export flour trade of the United States is one of the most important items of American commerce.

Depending for prosperity upon the welfare of the flour-milling industry are mill-building, mill-furnishing, coopers, and bag factories; in all, numbering several scores and having more than $50,000,000 capital employed, besides giving employment to many thousands of workmen.

In comparison with the above figures, corn milling, which is relatively an important industry, amounts in value of products and capital invested to only a small fraction of the vast industry of wheat-flour milling and its allied industries. Of the whole corn-milling industry, only a small percentage of plants are devoted to the production of wheat-flour adulterants. But if it were true, as they say, and we deny, that honest branding would injure them, what great injury, from a commercial standpoint, would be done by the enactment of the proposed law? It seeks to protect a mighty and an honored industry that is a tremendous force in our national commercial life. It is opposed only by swindlers, not one of whom will, we believe, undertake to plead his cause before your honorable committee.

To prevent this fraud on the pure wheat flour—the staff of life—ask the law-makers of the land to enact a bill which shall compel the honest branding of flour. They want no favors, but ask in fairness and justice for the protection against lawlessness that all good citizens should enjoy. They believe that the consumer should by law be guaranteed the right to know what he is buying for bread, and we ask you to deal with the question accordingly. If there were no question of fraud in the issue before us, I feel that the request of the honest members of the most extensive manufacturing industry of the United States should not be considered unreasonable or demanding too much, but is doubly justified when the evils they hope to abate are considered.

Give us a law that will compel mixers of wheat flour and flours made from other grain than wheat to brand such mixtures truthfully, declaring not only the ingredients, but the percentage of each; charge them sufficiently for licenses and tax mixtures enough to defray the expenses of the law's enforcement, and make the penalty for violations one that will be remembered. Compel them also to inclose within every package of adulterated flour, for the enlightenment and benefit of consumers, a card repeating the information given by the brand on the outside, and to declare, both in the wording of the brand and the card inside the package, the true weight of the contents thereof, and forbid the use of cornstarch in breadstuffs.

It is rather disheartening to pause and consider that it is necessary to come before your honorable body and seek relief from such evils as those described at the hands of fellow-citizens, yet more astonishing is the assurance that they will endeavor, by misrepresentation, sophistry, and other arts known only to dishonest tradesmen, to defeat any and all such legislation as is proposed for honest branding and honest weights of breadstuffs. They are employing a propaganda for the purpose of preying upon uninformed corn growers, reciting claims they would not dare to make before a body of men trained to the discernment of facts. For this reason we want them to come out into the open, as it were, and defend their trade, if they can. Our case will be presented to you by men engaged in conducting and promoting the pure-flour trade, for which the United States has earned a fair name. It would please us to have the makers and users of adulterants themselves come before your honorable committee and state their case, and in order that you may invite them to do so, we will furnish your committee the names and addresses of the leaders. We assure you that our case will thus be greatly benefited by the enemy.

Since the practice of adulteration has been in vogue our competitors in all foreign markets have made the most of our misfortune and are industriously circulating our tale of woe, always with the object of discrediting American flour. That the American flour trade abroad will suffer great loss is certain unless governmental aid in regulating the business is speedily forthcoming. The great loss being sustained at home by reason of idle mills renders prompt attention and action necessary.

An estimate of the amount of flour adulterated during the past year in the United States is difficult to make—that is, it is hard to get at the maximum amount—but information procured by the Millers' Executive Committee, based on the known operations of millers, flour dealers, and wholesale grocers engaged in adulterating, shows that not less than 4,000,000 barrels were fraudulently sold to consumers in Southern, Central, and Western States in 1897.

By far the greater part of this was disposed of in the Southeast; that is, south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi rivers. Thus adulterated, the flour was put into the retail trade at from 95 to 97½ per cent of the actual value of pure wheat flour. To produce the adulterated product costs from 75 to 85 per cent of the value of pure wheat flour. The gain made by adulteration was mainly the profit of the adulterators; yet, as shown, retail dealers were furnished the adulterated article for a shade less than they would have had to pay for pure wheat flour, but consumers were allowed to share very lightly, if at all, as to price, in the benefits of the fraud. As to quality they were victimized, while millers of and dealers in pure wheat flour, unable to sell their goods for less than cost, had to abandon all markets entered by the adulterators. The condition of trade in the sections mentioned is even worse now than during the period described.

It is this kind of swindling we wish to have abolished. It can not be done by State legislation. That has been tried, and is a failure because nearly all of the breadstuff business of the country is in the nature of interstate traffic. We do not ask that a tax be placed on corn flour or any other cereal product fit for bread if sold on its merits, but cornstarch should be taxed out of the breadstuff field if possible, and "mixers'" licenses and tax should be made to yield sufficient revenue for the enforcement of the proposed law.

Having made what may be considered in the nature of an explanation of the aims and wishes of pure-flour millers, I now desire to call your attention to some scientific facts relative to breadstuffs. The value of a breadstuff is chiefly determined by the amount of gluten it contains. The more of that nutriment and the less of starch a flour contains, the better it is for human food.

In this conclusion all investigators agree. It will be apparent, therefore, how inferior corn flour is to wheat flour when I assure you that the highest percentage of gluten analysis it has even shown was 6.90, varying from that down to 3 per cent, while wheat flour, such as produced east of the Rocky Mountains, in the United States, contains from 34 to 45 per cent of gluten. The ingredient that predominates in corn flour is starch, so that it will be seen that when wheat flour is adulterated with a large percentage of starch, the percentage of gluten is correspondingly reduced, and the unhealthfulness of the flour is procured.

Eminent authorities agree that wheat flour pure contains a little too much starch to constitute a perfect food; wherefore, the addition of a large percentage of starch renders it a very imperfect food. Such breadstuff is unnatural, and, if eaten continually, is conducive to corpulency and the ill resultant. The adulteration of wheat flour with cornstarch makes a very dangerous mixture, the ill effects of which are far-reaching. This does not apply to corn meal, which is a healthy food, but to the starch product of the corn grain. With very few exceptions, all of the fruits and vegetables eaten by man contain starch, and many of them, potatoes for instance, large quantities. It seems plain, therefore, that an unnatural starch diet, violent in extent, is dangerous to the public health.

Gluten lightens bread and renders it not only more nutritious but more digestible, and wheat is the only grain that contains gluten in any considerable quantity. Adding starch means the taking away of gluten, and this is being done in some quarters at an alarming rate. But recently a St. Louis firm received an order for flour "like a sample" forwarded from a city in Georgia. After examining the sample the order was declined and a letter, stating that the sample was at least half corn flour, sent with the declination. Soon the order was returned, renewed, together with the statement that the sender did not doubt that there was 50 per cent of corn flour in the sample, adding: "We can sell it and want more like it."

At that rate of adulteration, 100 pounds of pure wheat flour and 100 pounds corn flour mixed would contain only about 25 per cent of gluten, or a little more than half the average of American hard-wheat flour; yet such mixtures command about 95 per cent of the value of pure wheat flours. "Pure wheat flour is the only breadstuff that will make a properly aerated loaf," says Professor Goodfellow, the eminent English scientist, and other competent authorities agree with him.

However, what we want, and what all this talk is about, is a law that will guarantee the consumer in what he buys. If starch, let it be so branded. If corn flour, say so. If a mixture, tell the truth about it. What we ask implies an injury to no honest man, and we have faith that our appeal will not be in vain.

Respectfully,

AUGUSTINE GALLAGHER,

Representing the Millers' Executive Committee, also the Southwestern Winter-Wheat Millers' Association, St. Louis, Mo.

Mr. MASON. I also ask to have read a communication from C. B. Cole, representing the Southern Illinois Millers' Association, which is also indorsed by Frank Barry, of the Millers' National Association.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN: While the adulteration of wheat flour with corn products has been practiced in a small and quiet way for years, it is only within the past two years or so that it has become general, induced by the very wide difference in price between wheat and corn. Now, however, it has become so general that all mills, especially those doing business in the South, are compelled to do it or go out of the business. The legitimate manufacture of flour from wheat is paralyzed, and even those who are mixing are compelled to add more and more of the adulterant to meet the reduced price and competition, and are to-day among the most pronounced in denouncing the practice.

Whether the bogus flour is exported or not, the very fact that it is used so largely in this country must cast a suspicion on our flour that must result in great damage to the industry. With the loss of this trade, amounting to about 16 per cent of our production, a very large proportion of the mills must go out of business. Congress has it in its power to remedy this by passing such a law as will advertise to the world that at least one article of food we make and offer to foreign countries is pure, and that article is the "staff of life."

To refuse to do this will put a stop to all efforts to secure reciprocity treaties on flour whereby we hope to increase the sale of flour 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 barrels per year, thereby increasing our exports to the amount of $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 per year.

It is claimed by the corn and starch manufacturers that this will tax them. This is not true, as it is only the mixtures that would be taxed, and they should be taxed out of existence or the compound sold for what it is.

The adulteration of so important an article as wheat flour with an article that requires a chemical analysis to detect it should certainly be stopped, especially when so large a proportion of the consumers are so poor and so ignorant as to be helpless in protecting themselves unaided by the Government.

But, aside from any other consideration, there is a moral question involved. It is safe to say that almost every miller practicing this fraud has been driven to it, not from choice, but for self-preservation, and those who have held out so far will be compelled to do it in the future or get out of business.

Refuse to pass this law, and it serves notice to the world that our flour is a fraud and that Congress refuses to make it what it has always been heretofore—the best in the world; and when foreign countries refuse to buy it, or prohibit its importation—as they have repeatedly done with other articles of ours for much less cause—we will have only ourselves to blame and can not claim it is retaliation.

Respectfully,

C. B. COLE,

Representing the Southern Illinois Millers' Association.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, complaint has been made from certain directions that I, representing a corn State, the State of Illinois, should in any way favor legislation which would seem to abridge or cut off the sale of the product of corn. Illinois is a corn State, and any legitimate thing that could be done to increase the sale of that most healthful food product the farmers of Illinois would be in favor of, but those of the farmers of Illinois with whom I am acquainted believe in fair play, and while they would like to sell their lard and tallow, they have not been in favor of selling it for butter. It was at the request of the dairy farmers of the country and with the absolute assistance of all the farmers and the agricultural districts that we were enabled to write upon the statute books a law marking oleomargarine or artificial butter for what it actually is.

The farmers of Illinois, as I believe, do not ask to sell their corn for wheat. I represent them here, as I understand, when I say that the products of the farm should be treated as the products of the factory, and sold for what they are.

I believe if this amendment be adopted, and it can be demonstrated that corn flour, so called, is not deleterious to health, as it is claimed in the case of some oleomargarine, that a large market can be had. The export trade, it is shown by these letters, has been almost cut in two; that 50 per cent of our export trade has been lost since it has been known to the people of the Old World that we are selling for wheat flour an adulterated article.

I have had my attention called to a certain affidavit, and request that it go into the RECORD, which was produced before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives. It is very short, and I should like to have it go in now. The affidavit shows just how this corn flour is made and how sulphuric acid seems to be a part of its make-up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the paper referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MASON. I think, Mr. President, in order that those who are interested in the matter may understand it, I should like to have it read. It is very short, and I should like to show to Senators just how this sulphuric acid gets into this article which is used as an adulterant for wheat flour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested. The Secretary read as follows:

CHEMICAL ANALYSES.

I, Frank W. Powers, was for two and one-half years head miller in a glucose mill, much of the product of which was dry starch made of corn. The daily capacity of that mill was 200 barrels, made of the lowest grades of corn to be obtained. It was quite common to use heated and otherwise unsound corn. I have often seen corn come into the mill in such bad condition that it had to be dug out of cars with picks, shoveling being out of the question.

The drawing shown on the attached sheet will serve as a rough illustration of the system of preparation the corn grain undergoes before milling. "A" is a pump, which forces pure air through a pipe marked "D" into "B," which is a sulphur kiln (lined with fire brick, used for burning sulphur), where the air is impregnated with sulphur fumes and then driven through the pipe marked "E" into "C," which is a tank known as the "steep," which is filled with corn grain immersed in hot water. The application of water serves to moisten the grain, so as to permit the sulphur fumes to thoroughly penetrate it.

The object of this is to loosen the bran and germ and separate the starch cells; also to bleach the starch, this latter being rendered necessary by the use of yellow, red, mixed, and generally impure corn. After the fumes leave the kiln B, coming in contact with hot water in tank C, sulphuric acid is produced, rendering the use of brass pipes necessary, the destructiveness of the acid making the use of any other metal impracticable, as the acid would eat through them in a few days. The acid is so powerful and dangerous that wherever it touches the skin violent eruptions follow, and when it comes into contact with clothing the same is burned as though with coals of fire.

Leaving the tank C, the charged grain passes to a millstone, where it is crushed to a pulp. It then goes, without purification, to separating sieves, which scalp off the bran, leaving the starch in semiliquid form. After settling, the starch is dried and pulverized and is put into the markets, thus charged with the sulphuric acid mentioned.

My own experience and observations are that the health of workmen engaged in the manufacture of starch by the process described can not fail to be seriously impaired. This evil effect extends to the packers, who have no hand in the production of the starch. The injury to health in their case is from inhalation of starch dust poisoned as described, clearly indicating that the handlers as well as consumers of this product endanger their health by contact with the same or its use. I sincerely believe that the use of corn-starch thus produced as human food is a serious menace to the public health.

FRANK W. POWERS.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 25th day of February, 1898.

[SEAL.]

A. L. ABBOTT, Notary Public.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, as before stated, there may be a complete answer to this on behalf of those who manufacture starch. It is spoken of, and I have spoken of it, as corn flour. That is the term by which it is called and sold, but, as a matter of fact, it is not corn flour. The life-giving process of corn is extracted. The affidavit just read indicates the presence of sulphuric acid in this thing which is sold by the barrel to hundreds of thousands and millions of people in this country.

A test was made by a member of the House of Representatives, using simply litmus paper, and a small amount of this so-called cornstarch flour on that paper turned to the color of red, indicating, so I am informed—although I am not a chemist—beyond any question, in the minds of chemists the presence of sulphuric acid in the flour itself.

If that is true, and if there is no complete answer to it, then, possibly, the article ought to be prohibited altogether, the same as I would propose to prohibit the use of white clay or ground stone in flour. But whatever the truth or falsity may be as to that, people may judge for themselves if they are given timely notice of what they are buying. Under the present law you go to buy a pound of butter and you have a moral certainty that you are buying butter, and not lard or tallow; because under the law of the United States there have been almost no violations of the law at all, or at least but very few cases. It has been found to be more profitable to obey the law. Many thousands of people believe that it is perfectly healthy to use oleomargarine, and they buy it on account of its being cheaper than butter. But the consumers, the ordinary people, who go and buy and consume it, they and their families are given notice of what they are buying; and I ask the Senate of the United States to give these 70,000,000 people the same notice when they buy the staff of life, which all men, women, and children eat, that we give to those who consume butter.

To show the widespread demand for this legislation, I have here petitions which have been referred to the Committee on Manufactures, of which I have the honor to be chairman, from almost every State in the Union. I have a large number of petitions in my hand. [Exhibiting.] I do not know the number of signers, but in all there are probably 40 or 50 petitions from the State of Massachusetts alone, presented by the senior Senator from that State [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Committee on Manufactures reported a bill covering this matter, and is it on the Calendar?

Mr. MASON. It is not on the Calendar, and it has not been formally reported as a bill for this reason: Those who wish to defeat this legislation saw at a glance, as I saw, that this was a revenue measure, and as it is nominally a revenue measure it could not originate, under the Constitution, in this body. Therefore there was no way for this body to act unless the Committee on Finance adopted this bill as an amendment to the pending revenue measure.

I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire now that unless we give the people this relief or protection in this bill we shall have no further chance to give it unless some other revenue bill shall come from the House of Representatives again, to which we can offer it as an amendment, and by that means give the people protection.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I am very greatly interested in this matter, and will very cordially support this proposition to have pure flour. I think it is a great outrage upon the people of this country that they should be imposed upon by adulterated flour. I will ask the Senator whether this matter has been or is now before the House of Representatives by bill?

Mr. MASON. It is before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and has been discussed there.

Mr. GALLINGER. But has not been reported?

Mr. MASON. But no effort, as I am informed, has been made there to introduce it as a part of this war revenue bill. I saw, I thought, an opportunity in this revenue bill, without taking a great deal of time, to produce a little revenue and at the same time have legislation which may originate in the Senate by being a legitimate amendment, which is germane to the subject, and to be made a part of this war revenue bill. Therefore the Committee on Manufactures, instead of instructing me to report it to the Senate as a separate bill, which would be subject to a point of order and have been of no avail, instructed me to report it not as a revenue bill originating in the Senate, but as an amendment to the war revenue bill; and I did so.

I have presented the amendment to the Committee on Finance. The committee has been unable, however, on account of the very great pressure of other matters, to give me more than two or three minutes, during which I could not present it fairly to the committee. I do not know whether the committee intend to recommend it as a committee amendment or not. I have not been informed by the chairman. I do not know whether they will take a vote on the question or not. I intend to have it voted upon in the Senate when it shall be in order; and I am informed by the chairman of the committee—and I am glad to know it—that when the vote is taken upon the other amendments, I may have an opportunity of securing a vote upon this amendment.

I was showing to the Senate, Mr. President, a large number of petitions directly calling attention to this particular bill against adulterated flour. I have a number here from the State of Missouri; here are more from the State of Minnesota; here are some from the State of Connecticut, introduced by the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]—no less than perhaps a dozen different petitions from that State—asking that this Congress take some action to prevent the continued adulteration of flour; and, as stated, clearly there is no other way the Government can reach it except by the policy adopted in the oleomargarine law.

Here are petitions from the State of Missouri, which I shall later insert in the RECORD. Then I have petitions from the State of Indiana. Here [exhibiting] is a petition and a letter directly in regard to the adulteration of wheat flour, which was referred to the committee by the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS]. Here are petitions from Nebraska, introduced and referred to the committee by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], praying for the passage of this bill when it was a bill, and not as an amendment to the present revenue bill. I have also petitions here from New York, from Tennessee, from Kentucky, more from Massachusetts, introduced by the junior Senator [Mr. LODGE], another petition of citizens of Jasper County, favoring the passage of a bill in regard to branding flour and other products. That was introduced by the senior Senator from Missouri. Here are others from Minnesota.

I will just take one moment to put into the RECORD a petition from the State of Illinois, presented by the senior Senator, my colleague [Mr. CULLOM]. No less than twenty-five or thirty were referred to the committee, but most of them, in fact practically all, are from the Order of Patrons of Husbandry of the State of Illinois, petitioning the Congress of the United States to enact such legislation at the earliest practicable moment as will secure the people of the country protection against the use of adulterated food products. These petitions from Illinois which were presented by my colleague do not directly call attention to the bill directed against the adulteration of flour, but certainly flour is a staple food product, and certainly the use not of corn meal, not corn flour, not fairly cornstarch, but the by-products of corn after there has been extracted from it everything but the starch, falls within that against which the petitioners ask protection.

I have here in the committee report an analysis showing what it contains, and practically everything is extracted except the starch. There are some petitions from Tennessee and from Missouri. The petition which I hold in my hand from Missouri calls attention to the proposed legislation to prohibit the adulteration of flour. It contains many letters from prominent business men and millers.

It will be said, and truthfully said, that the millers of the country are those seeking protection. I know no reason why they should not have fair protection. If a miller is making and is willing to make honest wheat flour, he ought not to be driven out of business, as they have been and are being driven out of business, by those who are wholly unmindful of everything except themselves, and who adulterate flour and thereby undersell. As a matter of fact, you can buy a hundred pounds of flour very nearly as cheaply as you can buy a hundred pounds of wheat to-day, for the simple reason that the flour is adulterated in the way I have described.

I have not tabulated these petitions, but I think that certainly more than one-half of the States have petitioned Congress to pass the bill. There is no item in the revenue bill to-day that interests so many people as this proposition to regulate adulterated flour, so that the consumer may know what he is purchasing; and if my friends on the other side, with one or two of whom I have talked, insist that it is not a part of the province of the Government of the United States to regulate the manufacture, my complete answer is that the Government of the United States adopted that policy in the oleomargarine act and that the constitutional question was raised by those who manufactured artificial butter and it was decided in the courts all the way to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court held that, being a revenue measure, it was constitutional.

I can not state from memory the full text of the decision. If any gentleman questions it, I will produce the opinion by the Supreme Court, which settled for all time the right of the Government, and there is no other way in which you can do it. The hard-tack which is being sold to the Government of the United States for its soldiers is made out of wheat and adulterated flour and sold to the Government as flour, and I am informed, and I believe I can prove to the Senate, that not only is it adulterated by sulphuric acid artificial flour, but by clay—mineraline, so called—and the Government contracts are being filled in that way. Why should they not be? Why should they not sell to the Government since they are selling to the people of the Government the earth called mineraline?

There may be those who think that clay eating is healthful, but whether it is healthful or not, I, as a consumer, ought to have a right to know whether I am buying wheat flour or clay, and the Senate of the United States has it absolutely in its power, by the passage of this amendment, for the benefit of the women and children and those poor people who have not the money to hire an expert to analyze the contents of the flour barrel, to say to the men who are selling to the consumers of flour ground rock and ground clay that they must go out of that business.

Now, whom can it injure? Will those who believe in adulterated flour tell me who will be injured by the passage of this amendment? We have given great care to it. We have simply applied the law of oleomargarine to it, compelling stamping. We have reduced it so that it can not increase the price. The committee recommended that I put only 1 cent on 50 pounds and every fraction, so that a barrel of flour will take but a 4-cent stamp; and yet upon any estimate made that will pay five or six hundred thousand dollars more than the additional cost of levying and collecting it. Whom does it injure? Possibly the glucose manufacturer; but let the glucose manufacturer sell his goods for what they are. It makes little difference to me whether the glucose manufacturers live in Chicago or New York. There may be one glucose factory in Chicago, but there are 2,000,000 people there and they have a right to know, when they go to the shop to buy wheat flour and pay for it, that the mixer or manufacturer is not lying to them and playing a common confidence game and selling them something less valuable, simply because it looks like wheat.

Whom can it injure? It injures the mill that grinds rock that is being sold to adulterate flour. I propose to put into the RECORD, before I close, although I have not the papers and samples with me, so that Senators can see for themselves, the advertisements and circular letters of the men who say, "We send you this product. It is called mineraline; it is made of clay. We show you how to mix it with flour. For a high grade of flour you can put in about 18 per cent of clay and you can not detect it with the naked eye, and it takes a chemist, and a good chemist, to analyze and say how much clay there is in it. But for the poorer grades of flour you can put in from 25 to 80 per cent of the clay." It injures these distinguished Christian gentlemen, if you pass this amendment—the men who are selling as wheat these products.

If there is a gentleman from the South who can support that plan, I want to call his attention to the fact that it is in the South where this stuff is principally sold, according to their own circular letters. They notify their customers that they can work it on the South, because down South you judge flour by its color, and the more sulphuric acid you put into it the whiter it becomes; and so the South is the great market for it.

Here is one of the circular letters sent out by those who manufacture corn flour, so called:

For all Southern trade flourine is used very extensively, as all flours are judged by their colors, enabling the miller to produce whiter flour and meet competition by using our product.

Mr. President, I think I have covered the ground. Again, I call attention that I ask the right to make a synopsis of the petitions from the different States, if I think best, to add to my remarks, and if necessary the names of the Senators who have presented the petitions, which were referred to the Committee on Manufactures, asking for this legislation against adulterated flour.

Now, all I have to say in conclusion, and I think it will cover the subject, unless there should be a discussion upon the legal phase, is that we have boiled the amendment down. We have followed the law as to oleomargarine. Upon the question of affixing stamps we have applied the law in regard to tobacco and snuff. We have made it so that the total expense to the man who mixes flour is only $10 for the license and only 4 cents on the barrel, 1 cent on 50 pounds or any fraction. We have simply followed the law which has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Seventy million people like to know what they are buying and like to be assisted in keeping the dealer from cheating them when they buy food products for their families. Seventy million people ought to favor this amendment, and if there is any Senator who intends to vote against it on any ground except upon some political ground, some rock-rooted principle that the Government ought not to interfere in matters of this kind, I refer him to the decision of the Supreme Court and the fixed policy of the Government to assist the States in protecting the consumers of food products from those who simply adulterate and sell nothing for something, who assist in the common business of cheating, and who in some cases, as I have shown, do much worse than that by putting upon the public an adulterated article which is not only a fraud upon the consumer, but absolutely deleterious and dangerous to public health.

Mr. President, I confidently expect to have the amendment adopted by this body, and I shall reserve any further remarks I have to make until I hear from some gentleman who believes that by reason of some political fiction, by reason of some strained construction of the Constitution, in violation of the opinion of the Supreme Court, the few ought to be assisted in cheating the many. Until I hear a reason given by some one who favors a system of adulteration and fraud, I shall content myself to wait for the vote upon the question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I have no desire to speak behind closed doors this morning, I shall not call up the amendment which I offered on Friday last. I had intended to use the subject of that amendment merely as an illustration of an argument which I desire to make. I shall dispense with the illustration, if it is to condemn me to a secret legislative session, and make the argument, which contains nothing, so far as I am aware, that would require closed doors even under the narrowest construction of our rules.

My service in Congress, Mr. President, has not been very long, but I have served now some eleven years in both branches of Congress, and in that time I have been able to observe and understand, I think, the rule and power of a minority.

In the Fifty-first Congress I had the honor to be a very obscure member of the party which, under bold and admirable leadership, reformed the House rules. The House of Representatives had then fallen into a condition where it was unable practically to do business, and that reform of the rules, one of the greatest reforms in our system of parliamentary government that has been seen, was carried through very largely, if not wholly, on the great principle that in this country the majority ought to rule, and that an American House of Representatives which was unable to do business, except at the will of a minority, was a travesty on American Government; that is, the proposition was that a majority ought to have a right to act upon any question they desired, whether favorable or unfavorable. That reform, as I have said, was carried out. It made a great stir and excitement at the time.

After the storm had passed, the wisdom of it was fully seen. It was approved by the courts and by the people.

But it seems, Mr. President, that systems are stronger than reforms and than man. The new system contains the old principle. The minority has been changed, but it is still the minority that rules. It is now a minority selected by a majority at the start, instead of a fortuitous group, but the principle of minority rule is unchanged. In this body, where there has never been any change in the rules, it is also well known that unless under exceptional circumstances, unless there is a great popular demand or a very overwhelming majority, a determined minority can prevent action on a given matter of legislation.

Mr. President, if we assume for a moment that there is a measure which has been twice urged by the President in a message, that the Administration is known to desire it, and a majority in both Houses desire it also, and if under those circumstances we are unable to have a vote upon that measure in either House, nothing remains to the members of a helpless majority but to utter their protest. Even that privilege has been taken away elsewhere. But here in the Senate it is still possible for a member of the helpless majority to say at least what he thinks ought to be done, and to call the attention of the country, so far as one feeble voice may be able to do so, to the situation that exists. If such a situation as I have described exists, then it is desirable that the country at this period of war should know it. It is for this reason that I have taken the floor.

Some Senators were prompt to criticize me for the amendment I introduced, apparently with the idea that I intended to block and to obstruct the war revenue bill now before the Senate. Mr. President, I have never, to my knowledge, attempted to obstruct legislation in this body. I have no intention of trying to obstruct this great bill now, either by amendment or by speech, but I do think that the situation is such as to deserve a few moments of discussion. I believe that we ought to pass not only the war revenue bill as a war measure, but every other war measure that the Administration desires, every other measure which it regards as a military necessity. I for one am not ready to vote to adjourn until all the measures necessary for the prosecution of the war or thought necessary by the Administration have been acted upon by Congress.

The President of the United States is charged with the great responsibility of war. In his hands are the war powers of the Constitution. If a helpless majority in the two Houses of Congress are unable to give him in certain directions the legislation he needs, he can employ the war powers. If he does employ them, he will be justified and applauded by the entire country. But, Mr. President, such action will elevate the executive power still higher in the public mind. It will lower the legislative power in the public mind. This has been a deplorable tendency of late years. It is one that I certainly do not desire to see accentuated, and yet if Congress does not perform its whole duty, that is the position in which it is likely to find itself, and it is to its own prestige and its own standing that it will administer the blow.

The President is charged with the conduct of the war. The glory falls to him of successful war and triumphant peace, and on him rests also the heavy responsibility. If disaster comes, whether he be innocent or not of the disaster, whether it is owing to his plans being mistaken or not, it is on him it will fall, and therefore he has the right to ask of Congress the prompt support of every measure which in his judgment and that of his advisers is necessary to the conduct of the war, and until he receives from Congress every aid he can fairly demand, Congress should not adjourn. Until the Administration is ready to say, and does say, that the President does not desire the further presence of Congress in session, it seems to me it is our plain duty to stay here, in order to pass the measures he may desire and give him all the assistance he needs. When he has received all the measures he thinks the military necessity of the times may demand, when he feels that there is no longer need of the presence of Congress, he can signify it to us.

Mr. President, far more important to my mind than the amendment which I have not been able to use as an illustration is the question of adjournment. I for one, anxious as I personally am to leave Washington and return to my home, will never give a vote for adjournment, and I am against the policy that seeks to hasten an adjournment, until the President has received every measure he asks and until in his judgment it is fitting and proper that Congress should retire.

Mr. President, the existing conditions which have led me to make this statement, which would have led me, could I have had the freedom to do so, to discuss the amendment I offered Friday, I desire very briefly to describe. At the end of April the President ordered the Asiatic Squadron to attack the Spanish fleet, to capture and destroy it.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts whether he means to discuss the subject-matter of his amendment?

Mr. LODGE. I have already stated that I did not, and I have not alluded to it. I do not think Admiral Dewey's victory, about which I am about to speak, is a subject for executive session.

Mr. TURPIE. No; but—

Mr. LODGE. I have not mentioned the Hawaiian Islands, and I do not propose to do so, if that is what the Senator means.

Mr. TURPIE. That is what I mean. Under that construction of the—

Mr. LODGE. I stated at the beginning that I did not intend to allude to the subject-matter of my amendment. I do not intend to discuss it, but I propose to discuss the general aspect of the war, and that I think I have a right to do.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to refer the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts to the proposition that some time ago, when the general subject-matter of the war was to be discussed, we were remanded to the executive-session provision of the rules; and what is fair for one is fair for another. There may be an omission of a name, and yet the whole subject may be discussed. I am perfectly willing to discuss the Hawaiian question in the open, and have tried to do so very often. Having been denied that right, those of us who have certain views upon the topic will insist that anything relating to that subject shall be discussed in secret session, unless we are allowed throughout to debate the matter in the open, a debate from which we have never in any way shrunk and which has been forced into privacy by the vote of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I thought I explained when I began that I had desired to use the subject-matter of my amendment as an illustration of the argument I was about to make. I understood that if I did we would be put into secret legislative session. The argument that I desired to make seemed to me important. The Hawaiian matter I wanted to use simply as an illustration. I do not propose to discuss the matter of Hawaiian annexation. I do not propose to make any argument upon it. I propose simply to discuss the existing military situation, not future events, but past events, and where those past events have left us. I have not yet said one word that has gone in the least into any diplomatic or international question. I do not intend to do so if I can possibly avoid it.

The name of Hawaii would not have crossed my lips if Senators on the other side had not asked the questions. I did not intend to allude to the islands. The subject of Admiral Dewey's victory and the necessity of supporting him are open questions. That is the past. He is in Manila. That is a fair subject for public discussion, and that is all I had started to speak of. I do not know why Senators start in alarm when I mention the Asiatic Squadron. That is far remote from Hawaii.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to correct the Senator from Massachusetts if he thinks that I started in alarm at anything he said to-day or may say at any future time.

Mr. LODGE. I am glad the Senator is so full of courage.

Mr. WHITE. It would not require very much courage to make that remark.

Mr. LODGE. No; I think not. The Senator, I am sorry to see, seems annoyed, but I did not intend to be annoying.

I was beginning to speak of the Asiatic Squadron. At the end of April that squadron was sent with orders to capture and destroy the Spanish fleet. How that order was obeyed the world knows. Admiral Dewey descended on Manila and swept the Spanish fleet out of existence. As brilliant in conception as Aboukir and even more complete in its execution and results, that victory is one of the great naval actions of the century. We have to go back as far as Trafalgar to find one equally perfect in execution, more vast in its results. There he was sent by the orders of the President to make this attack; a wise attack, Mr. President, for it is not alone necessary in war to defend; it is also necessary, if we would have peace, to attack. The attack on Spain's most valuable possession was the quickest road to a victorious peace. There, then, was the American admiral, with his victorious fleet, and Manila helpless under his guns. It is all important to support him.

If, Mr. President, anything should befall Admiral Dewey, if any adverse fortune should come to him and to his fleet after their great victory, the American people would never forgive the Administration or the Congress under whom it happened. They would feel as the English people felt after the death of Gordon because no relief came to him at Khartoum. The President of the United States has sent a war ship, the Charleston, to Manila. He has sent 2,500 men. Seven thousand more are even now getting ready. They will go in a few days. They will be followed by the great armored ship, the Monterey. One of the best of American generals has been appointed to command. All these things are wise, prudent, and pave the way to peace, triumphant peace, for the United States.

However, Mr. President, I may stand alone in my conception, but I believe, and I have believed from the beginning, that Admiral Dewey and his fleet were in a real and especial danger despite the distance from Spain, and that the President was wholly justified in his strong and admirable policy of supporting him.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I have listened to these remarks for some time, if the honorable Senator will allow me, and I do not think they are such remarks as ought to be made public. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this subject in secret legislative session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the motion seconded?

Mr. COCKRELL. I second the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. According to Rule XXXV, the Chair is obliged to direct that the galleries be cleared and the doors closed.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to deliberate with closed doors; and after two hours and fifty-three minutes spent in secret session, the doors were reopened.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the pending question be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The pending question will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], in line 5, page 2, of the amendment, to strike out "one-half" and insert "one-fourth."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the stamp-tax feature of the pending bill. I believe it provides that every receipt shall be stamped. On the pay rolls of large concerns, where there are two or three thousand names, there would be required opposite every name signing the pay roll a 1-cent stamp. This would be awkward and burdensome apart from the expense. I wish the committee would consent, or consider, at least, whether it would not be better to strike out this provision of the stamp tax.

Where large sums are paid to employees by checks the tax would be 2 cents. I do not oppose the 2-cent stamp on the bank checks, but I do oppose the 1-cent stamp tax on receipts in large business corporations where there are a great many employees who simply sign the pay rolls. Another thing I think objectionable is the tax on the deposits of banks. It is a tax imposed on the debts of banks, and perhaps multiplied, as shown by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] on Saturday last, two or three times. According to the bank statement of the associated banks of New York, there were last Saturday about $700,000,000 of deposits. The reserve held against this sum was about $230,000,000, leaving $70,000,000 more money in the way of deposits than the reserve called for; that is, than the law requires.

Now, on this $70,000,000 of unused deposits there is a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent, which adds to the banks an expense estimated at about three-tenths of 1 per cent. On this $70,000,000 over and above the required reserve under the law the banks would be required by the bill to pay taxes. The result would be that the banks would discourage deposits by reason of this additional expense without any return, because they can not use in any way this seventy millions of unused reserve.

As the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] suggests, it is taxing a corporation on its debts. It is taxing the liabilities of the bank because the deposits of a bank are debts. The deposits of a bank are subject to checks payable any moment when presented. I do not think it is a good principle to impose a tax on debts. I do not believe anything in the present situation warrants taxing an individual's debts or a bank on its debts. The principle in itself is unjust. But it is more onerous especially where the tax is imposed on the same deposit in three different banks at the same time. It is onerous in the case I have cited, where the $70,000,000 of reserve now in New York banks above the legal reserve would be taxed and the banks get no return whatever.

The deposits of a bank are liabilities, its debts, and all these deposits are either time deposits or deposits payable on demand, and are all debts. If a bank has $500,000 in deposits, it owes it to its depositors and may be called upon to pay it any moment, if there is a run on the bank; and yet under the bill, seemingly acquiesced in by a majority not only of the committee but of the Senate, it is the purpose to impose a tax on bank deposits.

TAX ON GROSS RECEIPTS OF CORPORATIONS.

Mr. President, I voted at Saturday's session of the Senate to lay on the table amendment No. 177, proposed by the majority of the Finance Committee to the House bill 10100, to raise revenue to pay war expenses, and was gratified that there was so decided a majority of the Senate against the amendment.

This amendment proposed a tax on the gross receipts of corporations. In voting against the amendment I did not vote against taxing corporations, nor against corporations bearing their just proportion of the burdens of war expenses. I voted against the amendment because I believed it was unjust; that it discriminated against one portion of American citizens, shareholders in corporations, in favor of another portion doing business as individuals. The amendment favored individuals doing business or when composing firms by putting no tax on them, while it imposed a tax on individuals composing corporations doing the same class of business.

If gross receipts from business are to be taxed, then all the gross receipts on all business, whether carried on by corporations or by individuals, should be taxed. Otherwise individuals doing millions of dollars' worth of business escape taxation on their gross receipts, which amounts to almost a profit in itself, while individuals composing corporations are obliged to pay a tax. What becomes of the individual silver, gold, and copper mine owners, whose gross receipts often amount to many millions of dollars in a year? They are among the prosperous people. They make more money than anyone on their investment; and yet it is not proposed to tax this class of capitalists. I have not been able to understand why it is or how it is that there is no prejudice in the country against gold, silver, and copper mine owners.

Mr. TILLMAN. And coal miners.

Mr. ELKINS. There is a reasonable amount of opposition to coal miners, but if you want to be a genuine aristocrat in the eyes of many, one should have a gold, silver, or a copper mine. What answer has the committee made or can it make to not imposing taxes upon miners of gold silver and copper while others not so favored are taxed?

Mr. TILLMAN. Is the Senator in favor of an amendment to that effect?

Mr. ELKINS. What becomes of the merchant prince who does business amounting to millions annually? I do not like to mention names here, but take John Wanamaker, a man whose receipts are perhaps $10,000,000 per annum. I venture to say that his gross receipts amount to that sum, and the Committee on Finance do not propose to tax him at all. Take Altman, McCreery, Park, and Tilford, of New York; Field, of Chicago. Take all other merchant princes like these named, whose gross receipts amount to many millions per annum.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would the Senator favor an amendment including in this tax the gross receipts of coal miners and gold miners and all those?

Mr. ELKINS. It is already placed on coal miners.

Mr. TILLMAN. And not gold miners?

Mr. ELKINS. The trouble with you is, you have no gold miners in your State. You would change your doctrinaire notions about taxes if your State was full of corporations, as I hope and believe it will be some day.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am willing to tax anything down there in sight. We have little left. You have taxed us to death, but what we have left—

Mr. ELKINS. You are only taxed on the property you have; not on your debts, and not on property you do not have.

Mr. TILLMAN. We pay whatever you levy, and you levy on everything in sight.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, as I said, what surrounds this particular class of individuals—I mean gold, silver, and copper miners and merchants—that prevents them from sharing in the patriotic burdens imposed by the war? Why should they be exempted and favored above people composing corporations?

There is no answer to this. Everybody agrees that it is an injustice, and it has not been defended on the floor of the Senate.

It must not be forgotten that corporations are mere instrumentalities brought into existence by authority of law to do business, and are owned and controlled by human beings—citizens, men, women, and children—good, loyal, and true, the same as other citizens doing business singly or as copartnership firms.

I resent, Mr. President, the charge made by the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] that in opposing the scheme of taxation on the gross receipts of corporations I or any other Senator who voted against the same oppose a proper plan of taxation on corporations. I opposed this amendment because a tax on the gross receipts of a corporation is a discrimination against citizens composing such corporations and in favor of individuals doing the same kind of business. I oppose it for the further reason that it is a direct tax and not apportioned amongst the States and therefore unconstitutional. I oppose it because it would lead to litigation and long contests in court before it could become effective. I oppose it because it places in the power of the Federal Government the right to destroy State corporations by taxing them out of existence, because it strikes down State sovereignty. The tax on gross receipts is unjust and oppressive because it often taxes what a corporation does not own—it taxes debts; it taxes the tax imposed by States and already paid out to the States.

I do not oppose a just tax on corporations; not by any means, but the only proper form of taxation upon a corporation would be on the net earnings, on the profits, on something it owns and not on something it does not own. In supporting this war and providing revenue to pay our expenses, I desire to state here and now that I favor a just and uniform system of taxation upon property, imposed according to law and resting justly and equally upon all; and when this is done, I favor making the taxes as high as may be necessary.

Under such circumstances I would not resist a high tax, but I will always resist a tax that is unjust, discriminating, and illegal. I would greatly prefer an income tax to a tax on gross receipts, as proposed in the amendment of the committee. I would rather vote for it to-morrow, odious as some people think it is. There is some justice about an income tax. It taxes what a man has. It is a tax on something tangible. But when you put a tax on gross receipts, you are taxing something the man does not own, something he does not have, for the year's operation may bring him in debt, instead of making a profit.

I had hoped, Mr. President, that the decided vote of the Senate against the amendment would have put to sleep now and for the remainder of this session all attempts to tax gross receipts in any form, whether on the business of individuals or of corporations, but the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] has proposed an amendment, now before the Senate, which asserts the same principle contained in amendment 177, but in a more aggravated form. The Senator's amendment exempts certain corporations included in the Finance Committee's amendment and doubles the tax on the gross receipts of those that are not exempt.

What justice is there in that? You let some escape and you double the tax on those that are left. Amendment 177 was better, but the Senate even voted it down.

The amendment of the Senator from Maryland is intensified discrimination and injustice. Why single out some corporations and allow others to escape? This is not fair. Why should railroad companies be made to suffer more than other corporations? During the last few years, surely, railroads have had a hard enough time.

It takes some courage to say this, for railroads seem unpopular in the Senate of the United States. The most prosperous roads make but little profit, and most of them, owing to low rates, are now in a depressed condition. For the last twenty-five years the average rate of freight on railroads has declined more than 8 cents per ton per mile, until the average rate is now about three-quarters of a cent per ton per mile. That is a lower freight rate than obtains in any country in the world, and yet, for some reason or other, there is strong opposition to railroads and a disposition to tax them as against other corporations. Considering the improvement in travel, safety and speed, passenger rates have declined still more. According to the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year 1897-98, over 70 per cent of the stock of railroad companies in the United States paid no dividends. Under the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, all these roads and those in the hands of receivers, being now 25 per cent of all the roads in the country, will be required to pay a tax on their gross receipts the same as dividend-earning roads. This is not just.

How can this be reconciled? Is it just to make one corporation in bankruptcy, in the hands of a receiver, pay the same taxes that are paid by one that is paying dividends? It seems to me we ought to make a law equitable and just, and let it rest alike upon all people.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. My calculation may not be absolutely accurate, but I think it is. It is that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which is in the hands of a receiver, will, under the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, pay twice as much tax as the New York, New Haven and Hartford road, which is an immensely profitable road; and that the Reading Railroad, which is in the hands of a receiver, will pay twice as much tax as the Boston and Albany, which pays a 10 per cent dividend. I think this calculation is correct.

Mr. ELKINS. That is very pertinent, and I thank the Senator from New Hampshire very much for bringing the fact to my attention. The New York, New Haven and Hartford is a 7 per cent dividend paying road.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from West Virginia permit me?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. I think the suggestion with reference to roads in the hands of receivers is not a good one, for this reason: Every one who has had any familiarity whatever with receivership proceedings knows it to be a fact that the persons who are interested in the property and in the revenues of the property, in everything which relates to the value of the property, are the persons who are the main owners of the property and who at the same time are the creditors of the property. In other words, the proceeding to put a railroad in the hands of a receiver is generally at the instance of those who are in reality the owners of the property and at the same time are those who hold bonds. All that is made out of that property while it is in the hands of the receiver inures to the benefit of that class of creditors and not to the general class of creditors.

So if the principle of taxation is correct as applied to railroads, I do not see that there is any great hardship in the application of that principle to the roads in the hands of receivers as well as to the roads not in the hands of receivers. There is more money made by those interested in railroads through receivership proceedings than in the legitimate operation of railroads.

Mr. ELKINS. That is, more money is made for the receiver, for the lawyers, and for the bankers who reorganize the company; but the poor stockholders and the poor bondholders suffer. It is not true—the Senator from Georgia can not argue—that a railroad company or corporation in the hands of a receiver, which means that it is entirely bankrupt and unable to pay any interest on its bonds, is in a healthier condition than a dividend-paying corporation. There is nothing in that argument at all, allow me to say to the Senator from Georgia. It is a refinement that is not consistent.

Mr. BACON. I know the Senator is as well acquainted with the fact as anybody that in the majority of instances where railroads, especially the large concerns, go into the hands of receivers it has been due to overcapitalization and overbonding. The parties to whom the indebtedness of the railroad is due are the parties who are at last the controllers and the owners of the road and who have brought it to that state by overcapitalization and overbonding, and it all comes to them at last.

Mr. ELKINS. That would be true if it were not for the innocent bondholders and innocent stockholders, who buy bonds and stock as an investment and who had no part in organizing the roads and made no money by overstocking and overbonding. It is not necessary in this tax bill to go into the question whether railroads are overcapitalized and overbonded or not. Sometimes they are, but that does not touch the principle of the bill and is not pertinent to this discussion. This fact furnishes no just reason why they should be taxed on their gross receipts.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator from West Virginia will allow me, I should like to ask him one question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. Does the Senator contend that simply because a railroad happens to be in the hands of a receiver it ought to be exempted from taxation?

Mr. ELKINS. No, sir; I do not. They are taxed on their property by the States, and nobody knows that better than the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. But I mean under a general tax to support the Government and supply the necessary revenues to carry on the war.

Mr. ELKINS. They should be taxed on the net earnings, if they have any. It is not fair to tax a railroad company that is bankrupt, one that brings a loss to the stockholders and bondholders, the same as another railroad company that pays 7 per cent and another one 10 per cent dividends on their stock, as has been cited here in the cases from New England.

Mr. GORMAN. Does the Senator support the proposition that there shall be a stamp tax on the receipts given by railroads?

Mr. ELKINS. The stamp tax is insignificant when compared with this. It is burdensome, however, and it ought to be modified in several particulars. I wish the committee had given us a bill taxing tangible property, putting the taxes high, and even tax incomes, if desired. That would be better than taxing bankrupt corporations on their gross receipts or their debts.

Mr. GORMAN. Put the taxes on everything but railroads?

Mr. ELKINS. No; not everything. The Senator misunderstands me when he uses that expression. But I do make a plea in behalf of broken-down railroads—railroads in the hands of receivers; and you can not make any answer to the proposition that you prefer not to tax one corporation and impose a tax on another, though it may be bankrupt and in the hands of a receiver.

Mr. GORMAN. I want to include all.

Mr. ELKINS. But you make a preference by taxing the one that can not pay dividends the same as one that can. It is a preference; it is a discrimination. Then, under your amendment, you leave out some corporations. Why not include all corporations, and why not include all people having gross receipts? Gross receipts are the controlling principle of the tax, and there should be no exceptions as to individuals or corporations.

According to a statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], in his able speech made on Saturday on this subject, railroads pay to the States, in the way of taxation, 3 per cent of their net and 16 per cent of their gross earnings. This is the average rate of taxation, as I understand it. It is proposed under the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to tax the 16 per cent of the gross earnings that railroads pay to the States, which is multiplying taxes, or taxation upon taxation. This is a great burden, and railroads should not be made to bear it. In raising revenue to pay the expenses of the war why should railroads and a few other corporations be singled out for taxation and others exempted? No human being can answer that question satisfactorily; not even the author of this amendment.

Railroads are necessary, even indispensable. They have developed the country, added to its wealth and its glory as no other agency has. The people would not and could not do without them. The communities which do not have railroads are struggling to get them, because for want of them they are isolated and can not prosper.

Mr. President, in saying what I have I admit railroads often commit abuses, unjust discriminations, and sometimes outrages against individuals. These, however, I am glad to say, are growing less year by year. Under the interstate-commerce regulations and the watchful interest exercised over railroads by the various State commissions all the abuses should be and can be corrected without injury to the railroads and without overtaxing them. That they do exist or can exist is the fault of the lawmakers and those who execute the laws. I believe in the severest legislation against corporate abuse.

Railroads are the creatures of the State—the servants of the public. They can be controlled, and by proper law all abuses can and should be corrected. But because of abuses by railroads it does not follow that they should be overtaxed by the States and the General Government. Air, water, and fire are all useful agencies. Without them man could not exist. When not under control they are dangerous and often do great harm. This only argues that they should be kept under control, as should also the railroads.

Railroad and other corporations are easy to control, because the power which creates them can control them. We ought to strike at the abuses and correct them instead of striking down the railroads by putting burdens of taxation on them. A great government can afford to be and should be fair in all of its laws, and should not lead itself in peace or in war to injustice, discrimination, and oppression.

The gross receipts of a corporation are, in a sense, trust funds to pay its debts, to pay for labor, supplies, State taxes, interest on bonds, which in the aggregate often amount to more than the entire gross receipts. In such cases the tax sought to be imposed by the Senator from Maryland becomes a tax on what the company pays out in expenses on what it does not own. If there is anything left after paying all expenses and charges, then that is gain. It is net, it is a profit, it becomes property, and belongs to the company. It is something tangible on which a tax may be imposed.

I know the answer to this is that the net earnings of corporations can not be easily determined; that a corporation can, if it desires, keep its books so as not to show any net earnings; but under proper legislation no company could avoid showing just what its net revenue is. Let the lawmaking power declare it to be a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment to cover up or conceal or, for the purpose of evasion, decrease the net earnings of a corporation, and there will be no trouble on that score. It is a confession of weakness in the state to say that this can not be done.

The injustice of taxing gross earnings will be apparent when it is considered what disposition is made of them. Out of gross earnings the following charges must be paid: Labor, or monthly pay rolls, supplies and materials purchased, interest on bonds and floating debt, State, county, city, and other taxes, and always something for incidentals. If there is anything left it is net, and belongs to the stockholders. To make this plainer, take a corporation whose gross receipts are $1,000,000 per annum; the result would be about as follows:

The pay roll for the year amounts to $400,000. The Senator proposes to tax that. What benefit does the company get out of it? The company gives labor to the employee, and now you propose to tax this pay roll. It will not affect the argument whether this tax will be taken from the employees or not. The result would be as follows:

Pay rolls for the year	$400,000
Supplies and material	340,000
Interest on bonds and floating debt	200,000
State and municipal taxes	36,000
Incidentals	15,000
Total	991,000

Leaving a net profit of only $9,000. There is one item that is accurate.

Mr. CULLOM. What is that?

Mr. ELKINS. State taxes.

Mr. CULLOM. On what?

Mr. ELKINS. On the assessed value of the railroad itself—roadbed, stations, rolling stock, and other property. In the State of Minnesota a tax of 3 per cent on the net earnings is imposed in lieu of all other taxes. Then the depreciation would amount to $15,000.

These, taken together, amount to $991,000, as above shown. The Senator from Maryland is not willing to tax this $9,000, which is the net profits for a year, but he takes the $991,000, which the railroad company has paid out, and taxes that as well as the net profit.

Mr. PETTIGREW. On what road?

Mr. ELKINS. On any road. I cite these figures as an example. Of course they are by way of illustration, and not meant to be accurate. There is often greater net, and often the expenses are greater than the receipts.

Can there be any justice in imposing a tax on money paid for labor, for supplies, for interest, and for taxes, and particularly in paying a tax on a tax paid to the State? Such an injustice is worse than war. Away with it! and let us boldly tax property owned and controlled—something the citizen owns and enjoys and from which profit is derived—for war purposes. Man was not made for the government; the government was made for man. It is an instrumentality brought into existence for the benefit and protection of man, and this instrumentality should never be used to oppress him.

Mr. PERKINS. If it does not interrupt my friend—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Under the system of taxation which now prevails upon street railroads in many of our municipalities, they are taxed upon the gross receipts a certain percentage—it may be 2, 3, or 5 per cent—because experience has demonstrated that that is the only correct plan to arrive at a proper valuation of the franchise or the privileges which they enjoy. Otherwise their profits are absorbed by their extra expenses, paying large salaries, and in fixed charges which could be easily placed upon the company. Therefore is it more unjust in this proposed amendment of the Senator from Maryland to impose this tax upon gross receipts to pay the Government for the protection and privileges which corporations enjoy than it is for the municipalities to impose such a tax upon street railroads?

Mr. ELKINS. Because the State charters a railroad and confers on it certain powers is no reason why it should be devoured by both the State and the Federal Governments in taxing it on its debts and what it does not own, and all the arguments I have made apply with equal force to taxing the gross receipts of street railways. I know, in answer to the Senator's question, that it is difficult to determine what is net; but if we make proper laws, we can determine the net and then tax it. To say the net profits of a corporation can not be determined is largely to find an excuse to tax its gross receipts—to tax its debts.

COINAGE OF SEIGNIORAGE IN THE TREASURY.

As to coining the seigniorage in the Treasury, so forcibly presented by the Senator from Colorado in his speech, and to bring about which he has offered an amendment to the pending bill, one objection to this is that it would increase the currency and thus would require an increased gold reserve.

The amount of silver bullion in the Treasury as a result of seigniorage is 42,000,000 ounces. As I understand, seigniorage is the profit that comes from coining silver or gold. From one standpoint there is no profit resulting to the Government from the coining of silver purchased under the Sherman Act. On the contrary, there has been a loss. But putting that aside, can the United States afford to inflate the currency $42,000,000 by coining silver bullion and issue certificates against it, which certificates would have to be maintained equal to gold?

We now have outstanding paper and silver amounting to $908,000,000. Increasing this $42,000,000 would bring this amount up to $950,000,000, which we must be prepared to maintain equal to gold at all times. If the amount of silver sought to be coined could take the place of and retire $42,000,000 of greenbacks, so that no increased necessity would rest upon the Government to increase the amount of the gold reserve, then this might be done, and I should be entirely willing to vote for it.

Indeed, it would have been much better at any time within the last twenty-five years to have replaced $346,000,000 of our greenbacks with silver and issued certificates against the same than to have continued the greenbacks. As it stands, the $346,000,000 of greenbacks or legal tenders have no value except as money, whereas the $346,000,000 of silver would have, apart from its money value, a market value of half that sum. This would be giving us a more substantial money in itself than legal-tender paper money and would not have required so large a gold reserve.

INCREASING LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

As the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] well remarked in his able speech, as a nation we are about entering upon an unknown sea; a new destiny is before us; what the end will be no one can tell; much depends upon the beginning we make, what we do now. We should not begin this new chapter in our national life by forced loans, debasing the currency, putting gold at a premium immediately, and impairing the national credit. We should not begin with doubtful revenue legislation that must be interpreted by the courts before it can be effective for the purposes for which it is passed. We should not begin by legislating in favor of one set of our citizens and against another. We should not begin by adopting and renewing worn-out heresies, and errors which grew up during the civil war and from which we have been trying to escape for thirty years. This is no time for untried experiments, doctrinaire theories of government, and Populistic fancies about finance. We can not afford to listen to frantic appeals to passion and prejudice against sound money and preserving the national credit. All these ugly things should be hidden away, and brought forth for discussion, if ever, when other less dangerous and less serious problems confront us.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. ELKINS. I do.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have the Senator tell us what he considers sound money.

Mr. ELKINS. I have not the time to explain to the Senator. I think the Senator knows what sound money is. I know that he would prefer gold to anything on this earth right now. If he could have a million dollars of it, he would not air his Populistic views as he does at this moment. If he had a million dollars in gold, notwithstanding all of his notions about free coinage of silver and fiat money, he would be a sound-money man.

Mr. BACON. By sound money the Senator means gold?

Mr. ELKINS. I mean any money that is as good as gold the world over, and that is the kind of money we have now under wise Republican legislation.

Mr. President, I hold we should keep the splendid record we have made in strengthening and maintaining the public credit and continue to give the people sound money, good the world over. If the United States had not redeemed all of its paper money in gold and paid its bonds, principal and interest, as they matured in the best money, we would now be without a sound currency and without credit, both necessary to carry on war. As it is, and owing to what we have done in keeping faith, our credit is the highest in the world. We began this war with the best credit in the world. We should foster and maintain this credit. We can borrow as a result of our good credit all the money we want; but I favor taxing liberally before we resort to borrowing.

Business principles and business methods are the same, whether applied to individuals or to the Government. The same principles and the same methods that govern business in the commercial world or between man and man should govern all business transactions between the Government and its citizens. There can not be one rule of business for the Government and another for individuals. The Government should pay its obligations and borrow money just as do individuals.

But the Government can not engage in business by which it can make money. It puts its strong hand on the people, through taxation, and raises the necessary money to pay its expenses. An individual, firm, or corporation engages in business and makes money out of business. If an individual can not pay current expenses and all of his obligations, he does not make forced loans from his neighbors. The law does not allow him so to do. He makes use of his credit, and borrows by giving security and paying interest.

If the Government finds it has not sufficient money on hand to pay all its debts and obligations, it should borrow and pay interest on its notes the same as does an individual. Why should a great government, composed of all the members of society, be exempt from or enjoy the privilege of not paying interest when an individual is required to do so? If the Government requires money, it should raise it by taxation or borrow it; it should not attempt to issue its notes without interest, payable on demand, and oblige its citizens to take them. This would be a forced loan, taking private property without just compensation, because it is appropriating the interest belonging to the individual citizen to its own use.

The making of the evidences of the indebtedness of the Government legal-tender money in the payment of private debts is a solecism in finance. The issuing of greenbacks or legal-tender notes has been the most costly experiment ever adopted by the Government in the management of its finances, and more demoralization has followed it than any other feature incident to the administration of our finances. The greenbacks have been an incubus upon the Government and business; they have done the nation's credit and business of the country great harm. They should have been redeemed as soon after the war as possible. It would have been better for the Government to have borrowed the money it needed during the war by selling bonds than issuing legal-tender notes to carry on the war.

If legal-tender notes did not furnish the means of depleting the gold reserve in the Treasury, causing periodic disturbances in business and financial affairs, they would not work harm nor be objectionable so long as the credit of the Government is so strong that it can borrow on its notes without interest, and the people are willing to take and pay them out as money. It is strange that just as we are trying to get rid of legal-tender notes, the legacy of the war, substituting gold for them and getting on a sound financial basis, it is proposed now to issue more legal-tender notes, which will require more gold in the Treasury to redeem them. It is as dangerous for a nation as for an individual to increase its demand obligations when it has not sufficient reserve with which to meet these obligations.

With the world's production of gold constantly increasing until it will reach, according to best estimates, next year $250,000,000, why increase our paper money, why go back to inflation, why debase our currency, why not stand for the best money in the world for our soldiers and sailors now fighting our battles as well as for all of our people? It would be unpatriotic and a burning injustice to our soldiers and sailors to pay them in a depreciated currency. They deserve and they will receive their pay in money equal to the best in the world.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the Senator will allow me, I am informed that the Government has shipped Mexican dollars to pay our troops in Manila when they arrive there. Was that sending them the best money?

Mr. GEAR. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Government shipped those Mexican dollars because the Mexican dollars would buy more there than would the American dollar, while they could buy the Mexican dollars here at 46 cents each.

Mr. ELKINS. They do not know any better there than to take Mexican silver, but they will know better after we acquire the islands. We will teach the natives sound finance. They will rapidly learn. I am astonished at the Senator from South Dakota making an argument like that.

Mr. GEAR. I repeat that if they were paid in Mexican silver dollars it was because such dollars would buy more at Manila than would our silver dollar, and, as I have said, the Mexican dollar can be bought here for 46 cents.

Mr. ELKINS. The amendment pending before the Senate provides for the issuing of $150,000,000 additional United States notes, of like denomination, the same legal-tender quality, payable, redeemable, and reissuable in the same manner as the $346,000,000 of such notes now outstanding. This is a proposition full of danger and full of mischief to our credit and finances. The moment it is passed prudence would require that the gold reserve in the Treasury be at once increased, for which the Senate amendment makes no provision and confers no authority. The only way the gold reserve in the Treasury can be increased in order to redeem this additional amount of legal-tender notes would be by selling bonds and increasing the public debt, the very thing the framers of this amendment vigorously oppose. If bonds are to be issued to increase the gold reserve, why not do so in the first instance in order to raise money? Under the present condition of the Treasury, which is most favorable, it is all the Government can do to maintain the parity between gold and silver and redeem its paper money in gold as required by law.

To increase the volume of silver and paper as proposed by the Finance Committee would be extremely hazardous. In case we should increase the legal-tender notes $150,000,000 and our revenue should decrease, as it did two years ago, gold would go immediately to a premium, which, creating doubt and distrust, would produce a revolution in financial affairs and lead to universal depression in business, the shrinkage of values, and a panic.

Mr. BUTLER. As to the matter of gold, it is not likely that we shall need any for ten years. We have got so much gold in the Treasury now that they are paying the Government clerks at the end of each month in gold, and they will not pay in greenbacks. They force gold on them. I too have been paid some gold, but I will give it back to the Government now if they will give me greenbacks. The Government seems to have more gold now than it knows what to do with.

Mr. ELKINS. I suppose they thought the Senator needed that gold as an object lesson to teach him something about gold, and so gave him that money. I will tell the Senator why he got that gold. It is because the Government has reached that point where it has got to pay in gold, for it has no other money with which to pay, and that is why the committee desires to promptly pass this bill. The money which comes into the Treasury is taken out just as fast as it is received, and if we deplete the gold reserve more, we shall find that it will be necessary to sell more bonds; and that is what I understand the Populists do not want done, but it must be done whenever the maintenance of the parity of gold and silver is in danger.

Mr. BUTLER. We are for an issue of greenbacks.

Mr. ELKINS. I know you are. You are also in favor of inflation and a depreciated currency.

Mr. BUTLER. No soldier who is facing the enemy to-day, and no other patriot, will refuse to take greenbacks in the payment of a debt. Everybody will take them but the money changers.

Mr. SPOONER. They will be taken because they are as good as gold.

Mr. ELKINS. Yes; it is because they are as good as gold that the greenbacks are taken; and the people will hold us to a strict account if we pass this measure authorizing the issue of $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes and to this extent debasing the currency. You will find, if you do, the greenback will depreciate; that it will go down to 90 cents on the dollar, and perhaps to 80 cents after a while. Will you ask our soldiers and sailors to take money of that kind?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator says all this money is as good as gold. Every dollar that the Government issues is as good as gold; and gold is only as good as the other because the law makes it so.

Mr. SPOONER. It is as good as gold because the credit of the Government is behind it.

Mr. ELKINS. The argument of the Senator from North Carolina is too absurd to be answered.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from North Carolina had his way, our paper money would not long be as good as gold.

Mr. ELKINS. You can not create values by law. You can make legal-tender money by law and oblige people to take it, but you can not fix its commercial value.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no money except money created by law.

Mr. STEWART. Money is created in no other way.

Mr. BUTLER. Your gold is fiat money, and it is created by law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that it is impossible to hear the conversation going on between the Senator from West Virginia, the Senator from North Carolina, and other Senators.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me say to the Senator that gold is as good without the Government stamp as with the stamp everywhere in the world; and nobody knows that better than does the Senator from North Carolina. The Senator can talk to the people of North Carolina in that way, but he must not attempt to impress the Senate of the United States with any such financial arguments as those.

Mr. BUTLER. You can make a paper dollar five times as much by law.

Mr. ELKINS. Not by law.

Mr. BUTLER. You can.

Mr. ELKINS. If you could make money and fix its value by law and create something out of nothing, the Populists would soon get possession of this Government. If that were true the people would rush to them. That never has been done in the world and never can be. A government may make money, but the people determine its commercial value.

Mr. BUTLER. It was done by the Republican party when the Republican party was opposing slavery.

Mr. ELKINS. The Republican party redeemed in gold every greenback dollar put forth. That was the reason why it was done. The idea of the Senator standing here in his place at this time and talking about a government making fiat money! If that were true, we could all get rich by simply passing laws—labor would cease and the Populist millennium would be at hand.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me?

Mr. ELKINS. No; I prefer not to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. STEWART. It would be a hard question. I want to know—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. STEWART. If money is not made by law, how is it made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada will remember that the rules of the Senate require that before a Senator is interrupted he shall address the Chair, and the Chair shall ask the Senator who is entitled to the floor whether he yields. The Chair did so, and the Senator from West Virginia declined to yield.

Mr. ELKINS. I yield.

Mr. STEWART. He yielded and sat down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia stated to the Chair that he declined to yield. Does the Senator from West Virginia now yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ELKINS. I do.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the Senator state how money is created. He says it is not created by law. As a matter of information it will be new to me if he is aware of some other mode of creating it.

Mr. ELKINS. It would take a long time to go into that refinement. Money, to a certain extent, is created by law, but it is the duty of the Government, if it can get hold of some metal or something which has value apart from the money value conferred upon it by law, and use it as money. It is wiser and safer. But you can not create money out of something that is worth nothing—mere paper—and fix its commercial value, without there is behind it the power to redeem or the credit of a nation to make it good. These greenbacks, which the Senator talks about and in which he says the soldiers were paid during the war, sold for 40 cents on the dollar in gold. We imposed upon our soldiers to that extent, but we afterwards redeemed every dollar of the greenbacks in gold. If I understand him, I do not think the Senator wants to begin to treat our sailors and soldiers in this war in that way.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President—

Mr. ELKINS. I hope the Senator will pardon me. I am detaining the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not wish to treat the soldier differently from the bondholder. I simply want them paid in the same kind of money. Our soldiers were paid in greenbacks during the war. Our bonds were payable in greenbacks until a measure was lobbied through Congress to change the contract.

But let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that the law creating the greenback put an exception clause in it and deprived it of some of its functions. It is functions that give value to money. You have simply deprived the greenback of some of the functions which the gold dollar has by law—the most powerful agency and the only agency for money. That made the discrimination in value, and nothing else.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ELKINS. For a question?

Mr. MONEY. It is not for a question, but simply to answer a statement.

Mr. ELKINS. I would prefer that the Senator should answer it after I get through.

Mr. MONEY. I do not care to answer it at all except I do so at this moment. If the Senator will allow me, he stated that there was not an instance in the world of a government making money out of things that had no value. Was not that the statement in substance?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, unless—

Mr. MONEY. Unless what?

Mr. ELKINS. Unless behind it was the power to redeem and make the money good—

Mr. MONEY. That is exactly as I understood it.

Mr. ELKINS. In something that has value.

Mr. MONEY. There is an instance on record that everybody ought to know about. It is the instance of the Empire of Brazil, which had neither gold nor silver, but had a paper money that was absolutely irredeemable; there never was any promise to redeem it, and it always was at par.

Mr. ELKINS. Gold there at that time was 240 per cent premium, and often much higher.

Mr. GEAR. I beg to state to the Senator that if he will read the report of Minister Conger, he will ascertain that as compared with that money gold was at a premium of 440 per cent.

Mr. MONEY. That was a long time afterwards. I am speaking of the time when the Empire existed and the issue was limited. It was always at par. I do not mean to indorse or sustain any proposition to issue paper money. The danger and the only danger in that case is that there will be an overissue. As long as you can keep it down to a reasonable volume it will always be at par if it is legal tender for everything.

Mr. ELKINS. Suppose the Government of Brazil had gone out of existence. What would have become of that money? It would have become as valueless as the money of the Confederacy did.

Mr. MONEY. That would have been the end of it, like the Confederate notes.

Mr. ELKINS. Precisely. Suppose Brazil had gone out of existence. Would the paper dollars have been worth anything? But if Brazil had gone out of existence and her currency had been gold, its value would have remained.

Mr. MONEY. The same thing would have happened to the greenbacks if the United States had gone out of existence.

Mr. BUTLER. What will become of the bonds we are about to issue if this Government goes out of existence?

Mr. ELKINS. I beg Senators to excuse me.

Mr. GRAY. We do not propose to make them money.

Mr. ELKINS. They will go out of existence if the Government does. We are to pay interest on these bonds in gold, and propose to—

Mr. BUTLER. That is exactly the point. Pay interest to somebody and it makes them better. If there is a tax on the people, it makes them better.

Mr. ELKINS. The gentleman does not propose to pay any interest on the greenbacks. It is a forced loan. What makes them good is the faith of the Government and the law declaring that they shall be redeemable in gold. That is all.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. ELKINS. I must ask to be excused.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the United States Supreme Court declared those very greenbacks good of themselves, under the constitutional power to issue money.

Mr. ELKINS. And such a howl from the Democratic party and the South was never heard in all civilization as when the Supreme Court did it. Why not be consistent? When greenbacks were a necessity and possibly did some good the Democrats were against them. When they are wrong and harmful Democrats favor them.

Mr. TILLMAN. That was twenty years ago, after the war was all over. It was by a unanimous court.

Mr. ELKINS. I am advised that there are some executive matters to be attended to, and I must decline to yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield further.

Mr. ELKINS. We have outstanding silver and paper money amounting to $908,000,000. Three hundred and forty-six million dollars of this amount is in legal-tender notes and the balance in silver certificates, Treasury notes, and silver coin.

It is proposed by the amendment to the House bill to add to this vast sum $150,000,000 in paper and $42,000,000 in silver certificates, increasing the amount $192,000,000. This would make a total of $1,100,000,000 of silver and paper money, part of which is to be redeemed in gold and all to be maintained equal to gold, with only $170,000,000 of gold on hand and the authority to sell bonds to provide more gold as a reserve challenged by the authors of this amendment. They want to issue this $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes and then take from the Government the power to sell bonds to make this vast volume of money equal to gold. What an inconsistency!

These figures show the condition in which our finances are in at present. Before this proposed addition of $192,000,000 to the amount outstanding we thought we had reached the danger line, and we surely did two years ago. The Government should raise all the money it can by proper taxation to pay war expenses. When the limit of raising money by taxation is reached, the Government should use its credit by borrowing money on its bonds and pay interest.

That is what an honest government will do and honest people will do. It should not attempt by a forced loan to debase and inflate the currency, thereby destroying the national credit and bringing on the country financial demoralization and widespread business depression. Irredeemable currency, fiat money, laws to get something for nothing, are always favored during war.

Mr. SPOONER. And sometimes in times of peace.

Mr. ELKINS. And sometimes in time of peace, as the Senator from Wisconsin well remarks.

Mr. President, there is always in society an element of unrest, that wants change and is never satisfied. This element welcomes war and social disturbances because it believes they afford opportunities to try the untried, to fasten upon society impracticable vagaries and impossible theories in finance. All substantial revolutions in the interest of the people begin with the people and not with those who, under pretense of being their friends, deceive and prey upon them.

Revolutions are entitled to respect and consideration because they have their origin with the people, and for the most part are aimed at correcting wrongs and abuses. Great revolutions and great changes in society looking to bettering the condition of the people never begin with visionary theorists in office, or those who want to get into power by trying to arouse discontent by appealing to passion and to prejudice.

I believe a majority of the American people are satisfied with the present order of things and with this Government, and cherish for it a sincere affection, loyalty, and respect which increases as the years go by. For my part, I am not only satisfied but feel blessed that I am a citizen of the great Republic. I love our Government in peace and war. I love its flag, its people, its institutions, and its liberties; I love its martial music, its banners, the tread of its soldiers, its mighty battle ships, and the thunders of its great guns on sea and land.

My pride is stirred at the advancing glory of our country and the respect that it is commanding from the nations of the world. I know of no radical change for the better that can be made now. There need be no fear of foreign foes nor of war. Soldiers and sailors will rise up at our bidding and defend flag and country. What we need is resolute men, patriots, lovers of our institutions, in Congress, in the legislatures, and in power everywhere to protect and stand by the Government, permitting no invasion of the Constitution and the rights and liberties of the people, standing always ready to keep national faith and maintain the public credit.

Our present war, only a month old, has wrought wonderful changes in the public mind. We are surrounded with new conditions; new and difficult problems confront us. We have gone farther in some directions in a short month than we have traveled in a hundred years before. These new conditions lay upon us grave duties and responsibilities which we can not avoid. We must look now more and more to extending our commerce and finding markets for our products, and to this end we must hold all the territory that may come to us by the fortunes of war to help sustain these markets.

We must have a merchant marine, ships on every sea; we must control the shipping and commerce of the great oceans that wash our shores; and beyond all this, we must have a navy greater and more powerful than any that now floats. This is manifest destiny. Necessity drives us, our own interests oblige us, and we can not avoid keeping pace with the great powers of the world in finding markets for our people and acquiring at least coaling and cable stations all around the globe.

The mighty movement now going on toward combination and consolidation and acquiring territory by the nations of the world by treaty, or by war if necessary, is natural and logical. It has come about by reason of the demands of a better civilization, wider markets, and an increasing trade and commerce. We can not if we would remain longer remote, silent, and isolated. We can not resist this great movement, and we should not try to do so if we are to take the place in the affairs of the world that naturally belongs to us.

Because of our traditional policy of isolation and opposition to acquiring territory in the past, we must not put aside what comes to us by war. The Nicaragua Canal and Hawaiian Islands rise above the horizon and come in sight more plainly than ever; and whatever opposition there may have been to building one and acquiring the other heretofore must disappear in the face of the flag going up over Morro Castle, what has transpired so gloriously and is now going on in the Philippines, and the great trip of the battle ship Oregon from California to Florida.

Long ago, in 1809, Thomas Jefferson dreamed of and favored the annexation of Cuba to the United States. It now comes to us through a war we could not avoid. The combination and consolidation that has come about under the demands for wider markets and trade relations is reaching to consolidation of States and acquisition of territory in the interest of a larger commerce. The world is to-day but a vast neighborhood, fast being divided up into groups of vast families. It is drawn more closely together than were counties and States fifty years ago; it has become more commercial than ever; one member of this family can not resist in its own interest doing what the other members do. Merging of smaller States into larger ones and consolidation of empires is irresistible. Necessity lies at the bottom of this great movement.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to submit some remarks upon the pending bill, and I have waited here because the Senator from West Virginia told me he would take about twenty minutes. Now I am ready to go on if the Senate desires to remain in session any longer this afternoon.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly, retaining the floor.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 1, 1898, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 31, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. FRANCIS LAKE, ARKANSAS.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10087) to authorize the construction of a bridge across St. Francis Lake, at or near Lake City, State of Arkansas.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCULLOCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN M. TURNER.

Mr. SHOWALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 6397.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6397) appropriating $100 to John M. Turner, of Butler, Pa., late of Company E, Seventy-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $100 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John M. Turner, of Butler, Pa., late of Company E, Seventy-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, on account of act of Congress July 28, 1860, granting a bounty of $100 to certain Union soldiers.

Mr. SHOWALTER. Mr. Speaker, the records of the War Department—

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read. Is this a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is a request for unanimous consent, and the report will be read.

Mr. SHOWALTER. If the gentleman from Tennessee will permit me, I will make a short statement that I think will be perfectly satisfactory. The war records show that this soldier served over three years and was honorably discharged. They also show that by the act of July 28, 1860, he was entitled to a hundred dollars bounty. He became enamored of the beauties of the land and scenery of Tennessee just after the war, and moved down there early in 1866, and was ignorant of the passage of this law. He is probably the only soldier entitled to the bounty that never received it, and the time elapsed before he could draw the money; hence this bill. I trust the gentleman will not object. It is a perfectly legitimate bill, and is unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does he live in Tennessee now?

Mr. SHOWALTER. No; he is living in Pennsylvania.

Mr. McMILLIN. Why was not the money paid to him under the law?

Mr. SHOWALTER. He was ignorant of the law. He failed to apply, and the time has elapsed. He is probably the only soldier entitled to the hundred dollars who has not received it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHOWALTER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MARTHA E. FLESCHERT.

Mr. BAKER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3697) for the relief of Martha E. Fleschert.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Martha Elizabeth Fleschert, née Stevenson, of St. Louis, Mo., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $212.50, for services rendered by her as hospital matron in and for One hundred and thirtieth and One hundred and seventeenth regiments of Illinois Volunteers for seventeen months, from October, 1862, to March, 1864.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I think the report ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. COOPER of Texas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3697) for the relief of Martha E. Fleschert, submit the following report:

A bill similar to the one now under consideration was favorably reported by the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives at the second session of the Fiftieth Congress. Your committee concur in this report and make it a part hereof.

The report is as follows:

[House Report No. 3740, Fiftieth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11600) for the relief of Martha E. Fleschert, report as follows:

The claim is for services rendered by Martha E. Fleschert as hospital matron for the One hundred and seventeenth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers from October 18, 1862, to March, 1864. Claim stated at $212.50.

The proof filed in support of the bill shows that the claimant served continuously as hospital matron to the above-mentioned regiment for seventeen months, and that she has not been paid for said services.

Your committee are of opinion that the claimant should be paid for her services, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BAKER of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS FOR SCHOOL PURPOSES.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 1639.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1639) donating the abandoned military reservation in Wheeler County, Tex., to the State of Texas for school purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the abandoned military reservation within the boundaries of Wheeler County, State of Texas, known and designated as Fort Elliott, be, and the same is hereby, granted to the State of Texas for the purpose of establishing thereon a State normal school.

Sec. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall, as soon as possible after the passage of this act, cause to be issued to the State of Texas a patent for all the land included in said abandoned military reservation hereby granted, and said patent shall recite that the lands so granted are held in trust by the State of Texas for the use and purpose of establishing thereon a State normal school.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Amend section 1 by inserting, after the word "Elliott," in line 3, the following:

"Embracing surveys 47, 53, 55, and 57, patents 164, 165, 94, and 96, containing 2,500 acres, issued to the Houston and Great Northern Railroad Company."

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the report.

Mr. BAILEY. Before reading the report, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas about what is this land worth?

Mr. HAWLEY. Its value to-day is nominal, I should think. It is an abandoned reservation which the Government formerly used for a fort or garrison for United States troops. Some buildings were constructed there while the troops were garrisoned at that point. The Government has abandoned the reservation and the buildings which are there now—

Mr. BAILEY. I am not sure, but I think in the reading of the bill there was some reference to Greer County.

Mr. HAWLEY. There has been no reference whatever to Greer County.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is nothing about Greer County in there. The price of similar lands in Texas has been reduced by the legislature from $3 to $1 an acre. That is the price put upon it, as grazing land, in the Panhandle and plain prairie. The legislature has put that land upon the market at $1 an acre, at 5 per cent interest and forty years' time.

Mr. STEELE. How many acres will this convey?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. About 2,500 acres.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. GRIFFITH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred House bill No. 1639, have had said bill under consideration, and report:

Amend section 1 of said bill, beginning after the word "Elliott," in line 5 thereof, inserting the following words, to wit: "embracing surveys 47, 53, 55, and 57; patents 164, 165, 94, and 96, containing 2,500 acres, issued to the Houston and Great Northern Railroad Company."

And when so amended your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill how that land certificate came to be issued to the railroad company in the first place? Was this grant of land by the United States to the railroad?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think this particular land was given to the railroad company by the State of Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. There has never been any public land of the United States in Texas.

Mr. DOCKERY. How did the United States come into the ownership of this land?

Mr. HAWLEY. I suppose by the land being transferred to the United States by right of purchase from the railroad company.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In further explanation, I will state to the gentleman that a portion of the public domain was given to railroads in that part of the State, to those railroad companies that would build roads, and this certificate was issued by the State to that railroad, it having completed so many miles of railroad. The railroad came in possession of a certain body of land and transferred its right to the United States.

Mr. DOCKERY. Can the gentleman state the price paid by the United States for this land?

Mr. LACEY. Two and a half dollars an acre.

Mr. DOCKERY. Two and a half dollars an acre?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Two and a half dollars an acre, making about $7,500.

Mr. DOCKERY. What committee reported this bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEELE. Has this bill the approval of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. LACEY. There are a number of precedents for this action. The ground on which such a grant is placed is this: The Government has built a large number of buildings for barracks in a place where they are of no further use for national purposes.

Mr. STEELE. How does the gentleman know that they are not needed; does the Secretary of War say so?

Mr. LACEY. They have been abandoned for a long time. They were headquarters for troops. The buildings are there and going to decay. They are now in charge of an officer appointed by the Government for the purpose of looking out for them, but they will soon pass into entire decay if nothing further is done. If the State can take charge of them and put them into repair, they can be utilized for the purposes for which they are requested. There are a number of instances where old barracks have been utilized for public purposes.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether, after the present war is over, these buildings would not make a good place for a soldiers' home?

Mr. LACEY. As I understand, this is in the arid part of Texas, and it is not a very suitable place for a soldiers' home.

Mr. PAYNE. If it is not suitable for a soldiers' home, how can it be suitable for a normal school?

Mr. LACEY. The soldiers do not have to go to Texas, but the normal school must be within the limits of the State. We have already large provision made for soldiers' homes. Soldiers are dying off every year, and there will be ample room for the soldiers of the present war in the Homes already in existence. This place is not very suitably located for a soldiers' home. In fact, I doubt whether it is a good scheme for the State of Texas to use it for the purposes for which they have applied.

Mr. PAYNE. You think it is a bad thing for the State of Texas?

Mr. LACEY. No; but it does not strike me as being a good thing for Texas; but that is a matter in which they must exercise their own discretion. The buildings are no longer useful for the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the gentleman from Texas to say that there were no public lands in the State of Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I said no United States public lands.

Mr. LACEY. Let me finish the answer to my friend from Indiana. These lands became public lands because they were no longer needed by the United States Government for army purposes and were turned over to the Interior Department for disposition, and thus came under the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. The United States had no public lands in the State of Texas, but the State of Texas had an immense amount of public lands.

Mr. LACEY. That is true.

Mr. PAYNE. The State even built its public buildings and paid for them in that way, and I suppose they have State lands left.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; they do not need these lands. It is only a question of the buildings upon them. It is a question of the buildings rather than the land.

Mr. PAYNE. Are the buildings valuable?

Mr. LACEY. They are practically worthless for any purposes except for some such public use as this proposed use.

Mr. PAYNE. They cost a large amount of money?

Mr. LACEY. Oh yes.

Mr. PAYNE. They would be valuable to the State for school purposes?

Mr. LACEY. The State can utilize them.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask why we should charge a place like Los Angeles $1.25 an acre for land for the purposes of water supply and give a rich State like Texas 2,000 or 3,000 acres of land which we have already bought, with a large number of buildings upon it that cost a great deal of money, for school purposes? Why should they not be required to pay as well as a city like Los Angeles?

Mr. HAWLEY. The county of Greer, which has been a source of contention between the State of Texas and the United States since the annexation of Texas, has lately been allotted to the United States. Before that discussion was decided the county of Greer, in common with all other counties in the State of Texas, had her allotment of school lands, and as some counties did in the State, received about 18,000 acres of school lands, and that 18,000 acres they sold, and the proceeds were put in the exchequer of the county of Greer, and through that fund has established a splendid school system all over that county, which is to-day a part of the territorial domain of the United States. Under a recent decision of the Supreme Court the United States has received the full benefit of that 18,000 acres of land, and it seems to me that if there was nothing else, that is sufficient reason for the State to ask for these buildings and this land.

In view of the enormous benefit the Government has received in the county of Greer, to the extent of seven or eight times the value of that which the State asks to-day, I think the Government could afford, not in a spirit of generosity, but in a spirit of fairness and justice to the State of Texas, to grant it this 2,500 acres of land.

Mr. PAYNE. How much of the debt of Texas was paid by the United States upon the admission of that State into the Union?

Mr. HAWLEY. Whatever the price, it was the best investment the United States ever made.

Mr. BAILEY. If this were a question of public lands, I would have no difficulty about it. I am perfectly willing to grant every acre of public lands to the States and Territories in which they are situated. I believe that is the best solution of our land question. But this does not happen to be a case of that kind. This happens to be a case in which the Government of the United States bought the land and paid for it. But still there is great force in what my colleague says about the condition of Greer County, and I desire to say to the gentleman from New York that the difference between a water right and a school purpose is very great, and the Government has always recognized it. The Government has never granted public lands for the purpose of providing a water supply for either counties or cities, and has frequently granted public lands for the purposes of education. In view of the statement which the gentleman makes, that this is merely an effort to recoup the State of Texas for its loss in having given up Greer County to the United States, I will not object. But I doubt the policy of—

Mr. STEELE. I suggest to the gentlemen—both of them—that, as long as Oklahoma has had to take Greer County, she, rather than the State of Texas, ought to have this reservation for whatever there may be in it. It is enough for Oklahoma to have taken Greer County, and then to get nothing with it that ought to belong to her is still worse.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; Oklahoma, which now includes Greer County, has the benefit of the school lands which Texas assigned to that county.

Mr. STEELE. If Greer County has brought any benefit to Oklahoma, it is something which I have yet to learn.

Mr. BAILEY. The residents of Oklahoma would not agree with the gentleman. We would be very glad to take Greer County back if the United States will cede it to us. We contested the question in the courts, and held the county as long as we could; but the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States took it away from us against our will.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the theory upon which this grant has been recommended by the committee is not as a public-land grant in the ordinary sense of the term. We have recommended this measure for this reason: The buildings are expensive; they have cost a good deal of money. They can now be repaired and utilized and made of great value to the State of Texas. The proposition is to give to the State that which is practically worthless to the Government, but which will save to the State the expense of providing buildings, either here or elsewhere, for school purposes.

These buildings, I understand, are in such a condition to-day that with proper repairs they could thus be utilized by the State. Practically the Government of the United States is giving away that which it has no further use for and which it is not likely to have any further use for. These are buildings which were erected as a fort and barracks out upon the plains so that the Government might have troops conveniently at hand to suppress the disorders of the Indians. There is no longer need of such suppression; the Indians have had their lands largely allotted to them, and are now settling down as peaceful citizens. This property, therefore, is no longer needed by the Government for military purposes, and the proposition is that it be utilized by the State of Texas for the peaceful purpose of accommodating a normal school.

Mr. STEELE. Why not confine this grant to the 40 or 60 acres upon which these buildings are located, leaving the remainder of the 2,500 acres in the possession of the Government? The Government paid for this land at the rate of $2.50 an acre. Why should we not give the State simply 50 or 60 acres and the old buildings, which I think ought to be donated for the purpose contemplated? But I do not believe we ought to give away the whole of those 2,500 acres.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, allow me to make a further suggestion. If it is to be the policy of the Government to donate to the States the abandoned military reservations which may be found within their limits, it is obvious that it is very material how those reservations may be located at the outset. If the title is to revert to the State in which the reservation is located, the State may be enormously benefited by the location selected. This reservation was bought with money taken from the general Treasury of the people of the United States, and on it we have erected buildings more or less costly. Now, I submit in all fairness to both the gentlemen from Texas whom I see before me whether this is a fair and equitable proposition to the balance of the people of the United States?

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, with respect to this proposed transfer, I wish to say that when this bill is regularly before the House I shall, in compliance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, move an amendment, accepting the section of land on which these buildings are located. In their present condition they are entirely useless. If, under this bill, they are granted to the State of Texas, we propose to guarantee not only the establishment, but, so long as the title to the property may vest in the State, this normal school shall be maintained thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until the House is in order. This is a matter of some importance. There are a number of these bills pending before the House.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the proposition of the gentleman from Texas helps the matter any. It does not change the principle. Here are a number of buildings that have been constructed by the United States at great expense, which happen to be located in the State of Texas. The State of Texas comes here and asks us to give it that property. Now, the State of Texas is able to pay for it. The State of Texas has no equity against the Government of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have just stated one.

Mr. PAYNE. And I have stated a pretty good offset. The State of Texas has an abundance of public land for school purposes, so much that it could not use them all, and used them to build its State buildings. There is no claim for benevolence on account of a poor State. As the Chair has already remarked, there are a number of these abandoned reservations, the property of the United States, which it does not use, and every other State has the same right and the same equity. A great many of them have more equities to come in and ask the United States to donate these lands. I suppose we might come in from the State of New York and ask the United States to donate to us the custom-house in the city of New York or some other public building. It is a bad principle to start out on and we do not know where it will end. I shall object to the bill, either in the form proposed or in the present form.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6209) to pension William Stephenson Smith, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PRITCHARD, and Mr. MITCHELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 5006) to increase the pension of Edward Starr, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. TURNER, and Mr. KYLE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRINTING OF BULLETIN RELATING TO BEET SUGAR.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present from the Committee on Printing Senate joint resolution 143, providing for the printing of House Document No. 896, relating to the beet-sugar industry in the United States, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That there be printed 60,000 copies of House Document No. 896, Fifty-fifth Congress, being a special report on the beet-sugar industry in the United States, 27,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 13,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 20,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have some statement showing the necessity for it.

Mr. PERKINS. What was the observation of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read. That will do as well. I suggested that we have some statement.

Mr. PERKINS. I have a letter in my hand from the Secretary of Agriculture. I suppose nearly every member on the floor is somewhat familiar with the efforts being made to introduce the beet-sugar industry into the various States of the Union. This bulletin covers all the information that the Department of Agriculture has been able to collect upon the subject. There is very great demand for it from all parts of the country, and to disseminate this information this bulletin has been prepared. It is a Senate resolution, as the gentleman has probably noticed, and we think that the document should be printed in the number asked for.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the size of it? Is it a book or pamphlet?

Mr. PERKINS. It is a pamphlet, a bulletin, something after the form of these other agricultural bulletins.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it proposed to be printed with paper covers or in cloth?

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, with paper covers.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky demands the regular order.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope the gentleman will permit this resolution to pass. It will take but a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I withdraw the demand.

Mr. TERRY. I should like to inquire of the gentleman if the Secretary of Agriculture has any of the sugar-beet seeds to distribute after he sends out the bulletins?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I am not prepared to answer that.

Mr. TERRY. The publication will not do us much good unless we can get the product.

Mr. PERKINS. I know the Department has distributed sugar-beet seeds. Whether it has any on hand now or not I do not know.

Mr. TERRY. If we are going to send out these bulletins, the Secretary of Agriculture had better get some seed, because there will be a great demand for them, I expect.

Mr. PERKINS. I think there is no objection to the passage of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SAN JOAQUIN RIVER, ETC., CALIFORNIA.

Mr. DE VRIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 221, for improvement of San Joaquin River and Stockton and Mormon channels, California.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend for improvements and surveys of the waterways hereinafter named and their tributaries any sums of money now to the credit of and heretofore appropriated for the improvement of San Joaquin River and Stockton and Mormon channels, California, as and where, in his discretion, will best improve the commercial capacity of said waterways.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. CANNON. What is this for—a survey?

Mr. DE VRIES. The principal object of this resolution is to enable the Government to use the sum of $48,000 now to the credit of the San Joaquin River and Mormon and Stockton channels, California. The condition of these waterways is peculiar in this, that they depend largely upon the water which comes down from the mountains by the melting of the snow that accumulates in the winter to maintain the navigability of the streams during the summer season. This year California has experienced an extraordinary drought. We have had only 5 or 6 inches of rain where we have ordinarily had 19 or 18, and very little snow. Consequently the bars which have accumulated in these waterways during the winter must be cleaned out or else navigation will be seriously if not entirely impeded during the coming summer.

Mr. CANNON. This is to make available—

Mr. DE VRIES. Money already on hand.

Mr. CANNON. Forty-eight thousand dollars appropriated for another purpose and to utilize that money for the purpose mentioned.

Mr. DE VRIES. Yes; this $48,000 is already appropriated for uses upon these same waterways.

Mr. CANNON. I shall have to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE FOR THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution 28.

The Senate concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the commission heretofore appointed pursuant to the act of June 4, 1897, to revise and codify the criminal and penal laws of the United States, be, and is hereby, directed to prepare and, through the Attorney-General, submit to Congress at the earliest practicable date a code of civil procedure for the District of Alaska.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Revision of the Laws, was read:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

"That the commission heretofore appointed pursuant to the act of June 4, 1897, to revise and codify the criminal and penal laws of the United States, be, and is hereby, directed to prepare and, through the Attorney-General, submit to Congress at the earliest practicable date a codification of the laws other than criminal, and a code of procedure thereunder, for the District of Alaska."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. TERRY. We should like to have some explanation of the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] asks an explanation.

Mr. WARNER. The act of 1894 made the laws of Oregon, so far as practicable, applicable to the District of Alaska, except where they conflict with the general statutes of the United States. The laws of Oregon have not been revised since 1874. All laws since that are session laws. They have to be furnished to the officers of the Government in Alaska, the judicial officers, such as justices of the peace, and so forth, and it is almost impossible to get all of these session laws. There is a doubt as to what law is in force and effect in some particular instances, as, for instance, with relation to the selection of jurors, and so forth.

In order to have them simplified and codified and easily within the reach of everyone, not only the law officers of the Territory, but of the lawyers who desire to practice there, this resolution contemplates and provides that this commission, appointed by the President under the act of 1897, shall codify the laws governing the District of Alaska.

Mr. TERRY. Have you got enough population out there yet to justify this additional expense?

Mr. WARNER. If we only had three men there, we should have some law to govern them, but at least 200,000 will go in there during this summer, it is estimated. There must be laws and laws enforced in this District, and this will make it much cheaper for the Government and for everyone else concerned.

Mr. TERRY. Has the Attorney-General recommended this?

Mr. WARNER. The Attorney-General recommends it. The resolution has passed the Senate. The commission agreed to do the work, and it should be expedited as rapidly as possible. They are to make a report to the Attorney-General. That is what this resolution provides.

Mr. TERRY. What committee does this matter come from?

Mr. WARNER. The commission appointed by the President under the act of June, 1897, to revise the laws. Judge Culbertson is one of them.

Mr. TERRY. But what committee reports this resolution here in the House?

Mr. WARNER. The House Committee on Revision of the Laws. The resolution has passed the Senate; and when it came over here, it was referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws, and that committee have reported it back with the proposed amendment.

Mr. TERRY. It is a unanimous report?

Mr. WARNER. It is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER. With pleasure.

Mr. McMILLIN. How long will it take this joint commission to do the work?

Mr. WARNER. I think they will be able to do this work complete before the next session of Congress.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do they for the while they are engaged in this work suspend the work for which they were originally appointed?

Mr. WARNER. I think not.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do not they to that extent delay that important work?

Mr. WARNER. There is nothing pressing except the civil law. They have already codified the criminal laws of the District, and a bill is ready reporting on that work.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will not the codification of the laws that apply to the Territories be sufficient? What is the necessity for making an exception to those Territories?

Mr. WARNER. Simply on account of the condition of the laws. The laws of Oregon now govern, and they are scattered all through these session laws. They govern except where they conflict with the United States laws, and it is impossible almost for the officers up there to get hold of these session laws. This concurrent resolution is recommended by the judicial officers of Alaska, by the governor, and by everyone interested in the enforcement of the laws. It makes no expense to the Government whatever, but saves a great deal of money. The commission have already commenced on the work.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I would state to the gentleman that the people in that Territory are exceedingly solicitous that this shall go through.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, we are unable to hear the gentleman's statement on account of the confusion.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I merely desire to inform the gentleman from Tennessee that the people in Alaska, so adjacent to my constituency, are very anxious for this matter, and have informed me that as there is practically no law in Alaska it is very essential in order to secure the enforcement of law for the protection of the various interests of that community.

Mr. McMILLIN. This does not change the law, but simply codifies it.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I will state that my friend is correct, but there is at present great confusion as to really what law does prevail there—a portion of the law of Oregon and the general statutes of the United States, which breeds much confusion.

Mr. McMILLIN. We have already by statute designated what laws do apply.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Yes, sir; in civil cases; purely and only that.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Statutes at Large of the United States have not been revised since the act of 1873, which, as amended, carried the revision up to 1878, I think.

Mr. WARNER. That is an additional argument why this resolution should go through.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am glad to see the spirit of codification abroad, even if it does not apply to all our statutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object to the consideration of the resolution, but I wish to state that I should be very sorry if this should take six months of the time of the commission already engaged upon an important work, and thereby delay that work, to do which it was appointed.

Mr. WARNER. I did not say it would take six months. I say it may take six months, but I think it will be done in a very much shorter time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to; and the concurrent resolution as amended was adopted.

On motion of Mr. WARNER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

MISS M. O. CHAPMAN.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10420) for the relief of Miss M. O. Chapman, of Paulding, Jasper County, Miss.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $12 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to Miss M. O. Chapman, of Paulding, in Jasper County, Miss., being the amount contained in a certain registered package rifled from the mails by one Rubo Burrows in a train robbery committed near the town of Bucatunna, in Wayne County, Miss., on September 23, 1890, the said registered package having been sent from Paulding by Miss Chapman, the postmistress thereof, one day later than required by the Post-Office regulations, and the Post-Office Department having for that reason held her to the payment thereof and she having paid the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR MANNING LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 10525.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10525) authorizing certain life-saving stations to be opened and manned during June and July, 1898.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to keep such of the life-saving stations upon the Atlantic and Gulf coasts opened and manned for active service during the months of June and July, 1898, as he may deem advisable, the number of surfmen to be employed at each station during this period to be such as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service shall determine, not to exceed the number now employed, and the compensation of each surfman shall be at the rate of $60 per month.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter, it occurs to me. I would like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the life-saving stations on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts are closed during the months of June and July—

Mr. TERRY. Now, right there. Why do you not want that done this year?

Mr. MANN. They have recently been utilized by the Signal Corps of the Navy, running from the coast of Maine clear down through the Gulf past the coast of Texas, so as to make a complete Signal Corps service all along the United States Atlantic and Gulf coasts. The Navy Department considers that it is absolutely necessary that they have this Signal Corps in operation. Now, the life-saving stations, together with the light-houses, are connected by telephone and telegraph with the Signal Corps station in each district, which is connected with the Signal Corps in the Navy building.

Mr. TERRY. Have not we got a Signal Corps under the charge of the Navy Department independent of the life-saving station?

Mr. MANN. In certain stations only, and they are very few. The present Signal Corps of the Navy, so far as watching and patrolling the coast is concerned, is made up by cooperation with the life-saving stations, the Light-House Board, and the Weather Bureau stations. So that unless these life-saving stations are kept in operation during the months of June and July the Signal Corps will be absolutely without the patrol system. Now, it is not necessary to keep all of these stations open, nor is it necessary to keep the entire complement of men at each station. The usual number of men for a life-saving station is a keeper and six surfmen. The keeper remains during the entire year, anyway. The surfmen are laid off during the months of June and July. There are 177 stations on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including 8 houses of refuge—

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, this will involve an expense of $200,000.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Of these they desire to keep open 138, with four men at each place, and while the bill provides for an appropriation of $125,000, I wish to offer an amendment reducing that to $70,000.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I think we had better go into Committee of the Whole on the matter, and I object.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks consent for consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. PAYNE in the chair) for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10525) authorizing certain life-saving stations to be opened and manned during June and July, 1898.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was again read.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. MANN), as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred House Document No. 496, have considered the same and report the accompanying bill (H. R. 10525) with the recommendation that it do pass. The purpose of the bill is explained by the annexed letters from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

Washington, D. C., May 24, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a letter signed by the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 19th instant, and addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, inclosing a copy of a letter of the Secretary of the Navy, dated May 18, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, both relating to the importance of keeping open and manned the life-saving stations upon the Atlantic and Gulf coasts during the war, as important adjuncts to the coast signal service, and recommending legislation granting authority of law for the employment of life-saving crews at these stations during the months of June and July, 1898.

It appears from the records of this Department that the original letter of the Acting Secretary above referred to, with its inclosure, was duly mailed, but, it is learned, has failed to reach its destination.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

Washington, D. C., May 19, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of a letter from the honorable Secretary of the Navy, dated the 18th instant, strongly urging that the crews of the life-saving stations along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts be kept on duty during the war as important adjuncts to the coast signal service established along those coasts.

I heartily concur in the recommendations contained in the letter, but there is no authority of law for the employment of these crews during the months of June and July. I would therefore recommend that Congress enact the necessary legislation for the employment of the crews during the two months named.

A draft of a bill for this purpose is herewith respectfully submitted.

Respectfully, yours,

O. L. SPAULDING, Acting Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 19, 1898.

SIR: Capt. John R. Bartlett, United States Navy, superintendent of the coast signal service, reports to me that a complete system of observation is established along the entire Atlantic and Gulf coasts of the United States, and that the coast signal service is thus fully in operation.

This is effected through the cooperation of the keepers of all light-houses, crews of the life-saving stations, observers of the Weather Bureau, and connection by telephone and telegraph wires of the several services and the Western Union Telegraph to headquarters, Navy Department.

A very important adjunct of this service is the patrol by the crews of the life-saving stations along the coast, filling in gaps between light-houses and coast signal stations. Captain Bartlett has called my attention to the fact that under existing law the crews of the life-saving stations will be laid off during the months of June and July. The coast signal service would be greatly crippled thereby.

The coast signal service is of such importance that in order to maintain its efficiency I earnestly request that immediate steps be taken to obtain the necessary authority of law to have the crews of the life-saving stations—or half crews—kept on duty during the war. With regard to the question whether provision should be made for full or half complement, it is suggested that the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service be consulted.

As a special act of Congress with an extra appropriation making provision for pay of crews would appear to be necessary, the urgent need of prompt action will be apparent.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is the unanimous report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. There is to-day a system of patrol along the entire coast, utilized for various purposes, one of which is watching for any ships of the enemy and the other is to communicate directly with any ships of our own country. All of these signal stations are provided with the international code of signals, so they can signal any vessel of our own which is seen upon the ocean at any place along the coast.

Mr. KLEBERG. How far does this extend?

Mr. MANN. From the northern shores of Maine to the other end of Texas.

Mr. KLEBERG. To the mouth of the Rio Grande?

Mr. MANN. Yes. The amount of appropriation requested was $125,000, because the estimate was made on the basis of keeping open all the stations with a full complement of men; but upon consultation with Captain Bartlett, of the Signal Corps, and Mr. Kimball, Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, it was figured out that by keeping four men at 138 stations, instead of 177 stations, we would be able to keep the Signal Corps in good operation along the entire coast. Now, if there is any question, I would be glad to answer it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman state the compensation now paid?

Mr. MANN. Precisely the same, $60 a month. There is no change of compensation.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand the gentleman to say that during the months of June and July, under the law as it now stands, these surfmen are discharged.

Mr. MANN. They are furloughed during the months of June and July.

Mr. DOCKERY. Without pay?

Mr. MANN. Without pay.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not question the accuracy of the statement of the gentleman, but it is the first time it ever came to my knowledge that the law authorized the furloughing of surfmen during any time of the year.

Mr. MANN. I used the word "furloughed" because that was the word which was used in a statement to me by the Department. They are laid off during the months of June and July without pay, and the same men go on again in August.

Mr. DOCKERY. Who has charge of the life-saving stations during those months?

Mr. MANN. The keeper is kept there the year round.

Mr. DOCKERY. This revised estimate of $70,000 is based upon the proposed employment of four surfmen at 138 stations for two months?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the gentleman if he will not accept an amendment in line 4, so as to read "the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to keep such of the life-saving stations," etc.?

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that, but the bill says in line 7 "as he may deem advisable."

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman is correct, and the proposed amendment would be unnecessary.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the gentleman think that four men will be a sufficient number to patrol the coast?

Mr. MANN. The system as proposed is this: That from each life-saving station, where there are now six men, two men shall go off at night on different shifts and the men from different stations meet and exchange checks, each bringing back the check given by the other. It is not designed to man the boats, because four men would not be enough for that. The only design is to patrol the coast at night.

Mr. SIMPSON. Are four men the average number used for patrolling the coast? Do they not ordinarily use more?

Mr. MANN. I do not know how many they use now. They have six men at each station. The Department says that four would now be sufficient, because one is supposed to patrol up to 12 o'clock, and another from 12 o'clock on, the patrolling being at night.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not know that I caught the reading of the report aright; but if I did, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy concur in recommending this legislation.

Mr. MANN. They do.

Mr. DOCKERY. And the gentleman proposes to offer an amendment reducing the amount of the appropriation to $70,000?

Mr. MANN. Yes, sir.

Now, unless somebody else wishes to occupy some time, I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman, I can not see any necessity for the expenditure of $125,000, or even $70,000, to extend this Life-Saving Service at this time. In all probability there will not be upon the seaboard this summer very many people whose lives are to be preserved. So far as communication is concerned along the seaboard, either upon the Atlantic or the Gulf coast, it is done mostly by vessels; and these life-saving stations are close to the shore. Inasmuch as Cervera's fleet is now hemmed in or "bottled up" at Santiago, and as we are sending a great many Americans down there to look after that fleet, and as we know pretty well where the ships of the Spaniards are, it seems to me it would be best for us to utilize our Navy immediately and make an attack down there. Our seacoast is in pretty good shape, without any extension of the Life-Saving Service, unless we want to save some of the bathers who may be down there this summer.

It seems to me totally unnecessary for the Government to expend $60 a month per man for about 600 men who are to be put on duty at 170 different stations for two months. I suppose possibly the object is to make some patronage for the party in authority. But I really see no necessity for any such thing. These 600 men had far better join the Army and go down into the waters of Cuba for the purpose of taking care of the interests of the Government down there. It seems to me this proposition is an unreasonable one. The probability of this Life-Saving Service being needed to protect anybody's life on the coast during the coming few months of summer is, I think, very remote. I repeat, it seems to me that is a totally unnecessary appropriation of money—$120,000, I believe, was first proposed, but cut down now to $70,000—to employ 600 or 800 men to lie around the seacoast, smoking a cigar now and then, and probably having nothing to do during the whole summer.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I am rather surprised at the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] and at his ideas in regard to the Life-Saving Service. It is evident that he has not resided on the seacoast. This bill proposes simply to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to use so many of the life-saving crews as he may deem necessary during the period named; and we have no reason to believe that the entire body will be put into service in this way.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. How many persons are employed in this service now?

Mr. BENNETT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will answer that question.

Mr. MANN. There are 171 stations, with 7 men at each station.

Mr. BERRY. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that the United States Government has already a large number of cruisers, like the San Francisco, plying up and down the coast?

Mr. BENNETT. In reply to that remark of the gentleman from Kentucky, I will say that we have not deemed it necessary to place our opinions against the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy, who ask for this detail.

Mr. BERRY. I do not always accept the opinion of the head of a Department as absolute law for me. I look into the merit of each measure presented, if I have the time.

Mr. BENNETT. In reply to that suggestion, I will say that our committee—the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—investigated this subject, and reported this bill unanimously. There were fifteen members present when the measure was under consideration, and they all voted in favor of it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask one further question. I see the Acting Secretary says that there is no authority for the employment of these crews during the months of June and July. I would like the gentleman to explain why that provision of law was made. Why are these crews furloughed during those two months?

Mr. BENNETT. Because during those two months there is less wreckage, on account of the infrequency of storms at that season as compared with the rest of the year.

Mr. STEELE. If the custom of other Departments were followed these men would be laid off with pay.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY], who has an inquiring mind, wants to know the whereabouts of the cruisers that have been patrolling the Atlantic coast for some weeks to dull the edge of apprehension, which seems to have been very keen in certain sections because of the fear that the Spanish fleet might cast anchor up there. In a similar spirit of inquiry, I desire to ask what becomes of the $3,000,000 tugboat navy for which we provided some time ago? What service is it to render? That bill went at railroad speed through both Houses recently, and I hardly ventured an interrogation for fear I might delay or retard the passage of the bill, it being considered so essential to the defense of the country. Now I should like to know what use has been made of the $3,000,000 authorized to be expended for our tugboat navy?

Mr. RIDGELY. Four million dollars, I think.

Mr. DOCKERY. The Senate reduced the amount by $1,000,000. Now, then, that $3,000,000 ought to be accounted for somewhere. We have our cruisers coasting or cruising along the line of the coast, and then we have a tugboat navy cruising along the coast, and now I believe it is proposed to utilize the Life-Saving Service. I really think this last proposition is more practical than the tugboat instrument. As a matter of fact, I think the $3,000,000 appropriated for the purchase of tugboats and other vessels might as well have been dumped into the Potomac River as far as any beneficial results to the country are concerned.

Mr. BENNETT. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that if he wishes any detailed information about the Navy, it will be just as well to apply to the Naval Committee, of which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] is chairman.

Mr. DOCKERY. That committee came in with the bill, which was "to provide an inner line of defense." I believe that was the title. It seems that this bill provides still another inner line of defense.

Mr. SIMPSON. The most inner line.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The innermost line.

Mr. BENNETT. I think the executive officers of the Government are in a better position to tell what is necessary than are the members of Congress, and that we can do no better than to accept the recommendations of the heads of Departments.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true; but I was taking an account of stock of the various lines of defense. First, the Spaniards would have to pass the cruiser line, and then we would fall back on the tugboat line of defense, and then, again, it may be, on the life-saving inner line of defense.

Mr. MANN. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. SIMPSON. Can the gentleman assure us that this is the last line that will be necessary?

Mr. MANN. I wish to state that the principal object of the patrol system is to enable the Government, through the Navy Department, to communicate with these vessels. Every one of these stations has the international signal code. When the battle ship Oregon recently arrived on our shores, where did the Navy Department get the first information concerning the fact? It was through one of these signal stations, through the Signal Corps at Jupiter Inlet, that the Oregon first reported after leaving South America; and it might have been well worth a good deal more than $70,000 to communicate with her at that time.

The Oregon reported at Jupiter Inlet, and was instantly in communication with the Secretary of the Navy to receive orders. The same conditions may exist anywhere.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to say to the gentleman that I think that it will be demonstrated, if there is opportunity for demonstration, that this $70,000 is of more value for defensive purposes than the $3,000,000 carried in the tugboat bill—

Mr. MANN. Well, I think very likely that is true.

Mr. DOCKERY. Which was passed for the benefit of gentlemen who had tugboats to sell—

Mr. LOVE. The amount was $4,000,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not mean to intimate that the gentlemen who secured the passage of the bill had any such purpose in mind. I am sure, also, that the Secretary of the Navy, who recommended the bill, was sincere, but I only intend to say that the practical effect of the bill will be beneficial to the owners of tugboats. I think, however, this bill is a practical measure.

Mr. SIMPSON. Do you not think that, having afforded an opportunity for these people to unload a lot of old, worthless tugs on the Government, we ought to do something practical now?

Mr. DOCKERY. I do; and I am in favor of this bill. I think the bill is meritorious and should be passed.

Mr. SIMPSON. It came in a little late, but I think it is a good bill, that ought to pass.

Mr. MANN. I am not here for the purpose of answering any questions in reference to the tugboat business. I supposed the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, would see that that money was properly expended.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask if the present condition of the war between Spain and the United States does not make it less necessary to have these life-saving stations filled now than it would have been six weeks ago or two weeks ago?

Mr. MANN. Well, I sincerely hope that the war with Spain is that much nearer over.

Mr. BERRY. Does not the gentleman think the fact that there is no Spanish fleet threatening our coast makes the service less necessary than it would have been?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman must understand that these signal stations have been in use during the last six weeks.

Mr. BERRY. I understand the signal stations are independent of the life-saving stations.

Mr. MANN. No; the signal stations are the life-saving stations. They are not independent. They have been in use for some time past. Unless this bill is passed the men will be laid off at 12 o'clock to-night. They probably will be laid off, because the bill will not be passed that soon; but the men have been requested to remain where they can go on duty again.

Mr. STEELE. Let us pass the bill, then.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the reading of the bill. When the second section is reached, I will offer an amendment to it.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the preceding section the sum of $125,000, or such portion thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to section 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, in line 2 of section 2, the words "one hundred and twenty-five" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "seventy."

Mr. RIDGELY. I should like to ask the gentleman if the Secretary of the Navy thinks that $70,000 is sufficient?

Mr. MANN. I had a consultation with the Chief of the Signal Corps and Superintendent Kimball, of the Life-Saving Service, and they agreed to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MANN, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10525) authorizing certain life-saving stations to be opened and manned during June and July, 1898, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CODE OF PROCEDURE FOR ALASKA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the preparation of a code of civil procedure for the District of Alaska.

The amendment was, in line 8, to strike out all after the word "date," in the following words: "a code of civil procedure for the District of Alaska," and to insert "a codification of the laws other than criminal, and a code of procedure thereunder, for the District of Alaska."

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution be read as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the commission heretofore appointed pursuant to the act of June 4, 1897, to revise and codify the criminal and penal laws of the United States be, and is hereby, directed to prepare and, through the Attorney-General, submit to Congress at the earliest practicable date a codification of the laws other than criminal, and a code of procedure thereunder, for the District of Alaska.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

WAR REVENUE BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the revenue bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] has offered an amendment to the bill. To that amendment an amendment has been offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to strike out the words "one-half" and insert "one-fourth."

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] seems not to be in his seat at this time. I heard him state this morning that he desires to say something with regard to the amendment before the vote is taken. I do not like the idea of proceeding to take a vote on it in his absence.

Mr. BURROWS. For the purpose of settling the matter, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum is suggested by the Senator from Michigan. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Frye,	McMillan,	Pritchard,
Allison,	Gallinger,	Mallory,	Rawlins,
Baker,	Gear,	Mantle,	Shoup,
Bate,	Gorman,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Berry,	Hale,	Morgan,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Hansbrough,	Morrill,	Sullivan,
Butler,	Harris,	Pasco,	Tillman,
Carter,	Heitfeld,	Perkins,	Turley,
Chandler,	Hoar,	Pettigrew,	Wilson,
Cullom,	Jones, Ark.	Pettus,
Elkins,	Kyle,	Platt, Conn.
Faulkner,	Lindsay,	Platt, N. Y.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, assuming that there will be moved by the majority of the committee the proposition for the coinage of the silver bullion now in the Treasury, and that the minority of the committee will move a provision for the borrowing money at 3 per cent on bonds and certificates of indebtedness, I shall ask to have accompany those provisions the amendment offered by me on the 23d day of May, and which was printed by order of the Senate with a memorandum accompanying the same. I ask that the proposed amendment, including the memorandum, may be read by the Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

At the end of the last paragraph insert the following:
"And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States not to commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard, but that the efforts of the Government in all its branches should be steadily directed to secure and maintain the use of silver as well as gold as standard money, with the free coinage of both under a system of bimetallicism which will insure the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, furnish a sufficient volume of metallic money, and give immunity to the world of trade from violent fluctuations in exchange."

MEMORANDUM.

Act of Congress of November 1, 1893 (28 Stats., 4)—the repeal of the act of July 14, 1890, for the purchase of silver bullion, with this addition:

"And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallicism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in the payment of debts."

TELEGRAM

sent to the lord mayor of London and read at the international bimetallic conference at the Mansion House, in London, May 2, 1894, as follows:

"We desire to express our cordial sympathy with the movement to promote the restoration of silver by international agreement, in aid of which we understand a meeting is to be held to-morrow under your lordship's presidency. We believe that the free coinage of both gold and silver by international agreement at a fixed ratio would secure to mankind the blessings of a sufficient volume of metallic money, and, what is hardly less important, would secure to the world of trade immunity from violent exchange fluctuations."

NO SINGLE GOLD STANDARD—BIMETALLISM MUST BE PURSUED—"I WANT THE DOUBLE STANDARD."—WILLIAM M'KINLEY.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, this war revenue bill should be passed with as near an approach as possible to unanimity concerning all its parts. Where great differences exist, the controverted portions should be modified or omitted, provided always that enough is left to enable the President to carry on the war with Spain to a successful termination.

It further seems to me that the bill contains too much present direct taxation. There is no need of paying all the expenses of this war by taxes collected this year or next year. The benefits of the war will reach forward into the future, and so should some of the burdens of its cost.

The opponents of the war should not be allowed to make it unpopular by oppressive immediate tax levies upon the property or industries or current income of any classes of the people. In view of the absolute uncertainty of the sums required, we can most wisely wait until we know whether it is to be a war of three months longer, six months, one year, or two years, and can later than now provide for a just apportionment of the expenses which it may make necessary.

With these opinions, I shall incline to vote to reduce or eliminate some of the taxes contained in the bill, preferring to authorize the borrowing of money at 3 per cent interest on securities redeemable in one year or more, up to ten years, sufficient to maintain the Army and Navy until Congress shall again assemble.

For the purpose suggested of avoiding divisions upon contested questions, it will also doubtless be wise not to direct the issue of legal-tender notes in addition to the $346,000,000 now outstanding. In a pressing emergency such a provision would unquestionably be justifiable. The Republican party, with great zeal and earnestness through years of persistent effort, secured from a reorganized Supreme Court a decision that this Government can constitutionally issue, either in war or peace, unlimited quantities of paper notes and make them a legal tender for all debts, public and private. Of this pregnant fact I shall later speak quite freely.

But the present war has, up to this date, created no such exigency as to require such a new issue of legal-tender paper as may send gold above par as compared with the paper money of the Government. The war can be fought to a triumphant ending without destroying or endangering the existing parity of the various kinds of our present money; and therefore I prefer that the proposition to issue more legal tenders which, if pressed, will arouse bitter controversy, should not now be urged to a vote in the Senate.

The question, however, of the coinage of the silver bullion now in the Treasury stands upon different grounds. The restoration of silver to the coinage has been recently decided by the Senate not to be a breach of the public faith nor an act in derogation of the rights of the public creditor. The amount to be coined will be limited to what is now on hand, $100,000,000; and there is no probability that any more will be purchased. No friend of silver will ever again advocate the purchase of any more bullion to remain uncoined in the Treasury. Silver hereafter is to be either money or merchandise. If the former, it will be freely coined; if the latter, it will not be dealt in by the Government. There are some manifest advantages in converting the present bullion into money, and there is no danger whatever that so converting it will break the parity between the two kinds of coined money. Therefore it would be wise, convenient, and helpful to provide for that limited amount of coinage.

There is one important addition—the declaration which I have proposed—which ought by general consent to be incorporated in the pending bill. It would, indeed, in my judgment, be wise and timely to accompany all bills for borrowing money with a declaration against permanent acquiescence in the single gold standard of money and with a renewed affirmation of the intention of the United States to pursue and secure the restoration of bimetallicism; that is, the use of both gold and silver at a fixed ratio as the standard money of the world with the free mintage of both metals at such ratio.

My idea, therefore, of what the pending measure should contain when it passes the Senate—with due deference to the sagacious, able, and patriotic committee which has had and now has it in charge—is as follows:

I. Very moderate internal-revenue taxes, omitting such as are seriously opposed by any considerable number of Senators.

II. Authority to the President to borrow money sufficient to carry on the war by a popular loan effectively brought within reach of all the people, bearing 3 per cent interest and redeemable within a period not longer than ten years.

III. A bimetallic declaration, as follows:

"And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States not to commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard, but that the efforts of the Government in all its branches should be steadily directed to secure and maintain the use of silver as well as gold as standard money, with the free coinage of both under a system of bimetallicism which will insure the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, furnish a sufficient volume of metallic money, and give immunity to the world of trade from violent fluctuations in exchange."

VIOLENT LANGUAGE IN MONEY DISCUSSIONS.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this declaration against the single gold standard and in favor of bimetallicism ought to receive the unanimous vote of the Senate. It states principles which have been repeatedly asserted in platforms of all political parties in this country and in laws which have passed Congress and received Presidential approval. In inviting to its consideration the Senators who will give me their attention I shall endeavor to use moderate language, although, I regret to say, moderation has not in recent years governed the discussion of what is called the money question.

During my active participation in politics for the last forty-two years, covering the whole life of the Republican party, I have witnessed much bitterness in political debates, especially those concerning slavery, secession, and the war for the Union, and also the reconstruction measures of Congress which restored national power in the seceding States, but I am compelled to declare that it seems to me that all such bitterness of expression has been more than exceeded in recent years since the money question has become one of the principal issues in national politics. The question, apparently, is not sentimental, but purely economic, yet the anathemas which have characterized the utterances in its discussion by newspaper editors and orators have hardly a parallel in previous public debate.

Thoughtful writers have been puzzled to account for the animosities which the debates upon monetary science have produced. Gen. Francis A. Walker, in his work on Political Economy (page 128), says:

The discussion of the laws of money has engendered so much passion and prejudice as to make it hard to secure a respectful attention or even a rational attitude of mind toward any statement of monetary doctrine which differs in the minutest particular from that of the hearer. Men who are candid and even liberal in politics and religion become furiously or stupidly fanatical as soon as their views on money are controverted.

General Walker adds that—

When Sir Walter Scott made a surly critic say to the author of certain Letters on the Currency, "In your ill-advised tract you have shown yourself as irritable as Balaam and as obstinate as his ass," he evidently intended to characterize the whole race of writers on this theme.

This class of writers abundantly abounds in American politics to-day. The Chicago Tribune is supposed to be edited by writers who are governed by purely intellectual reasons in the formation and expression of their opinions; yet the Tribune on February 4, 1898, spoke of a member of Congress who differed from that paper on the money question as follows:

A conceited ignoramus is about the most despicable creature who can worm himself into Congress, for he not only lowers himself in the estimation of the more intelligent members whenever he opens his mouth, but disgraces the district which sent an ass to Congress to represent it.

All this bitterly denounced Congressman had said was that a creditor who would demand gold when he agreed to take silver would be a shylock.

With such an expression from the Chicago press as his justification, excuse must be made for the gracious Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] when he denounced in the Senate as a "monstrous proposition" a declaration which he and the present courteous President of the United States affirmed as an important principle by their votes in Congress not many years ago. Nor is he without another illustrious example justifying vituperation, in the late Secretary of State and former Senator, Mr. Sherman, who on March 20, 1868, wrote to Mr. A. Mann, jr., of Brooklyn, N. Y., as follows:

If the bondholder can legally demand only the kind of money he paid, then he is a repudiator and extortioner to demand money more valuable than he gave.

Endeavoring to avoid the bad example thus set me by the gold monometallists of the Republican party, I desire to depict in proper language the importance to that party of avoiding a committal to the permanent maintenance in this country of the single gold standard and of renewing its pledges to pursue bimetallicism.

REPUBLICAN PLEDGES TO BIMETALLISM.

Those pledges are fresh in the minds of all who listen to me. The first pointed utterance is that of the Republican national convention of 1888, as follows:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

In the national convention of 1892 the declaration was as follows:

The American people from tradition and interest favor bimetallicism. The Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money.

In 1896 the pledge was less prominent, but in six important words, which saved the election to Mr. McKinley, the platform declared itself in favor of the free coinage of silver by international agreement, "which we pledge ourselves to promote."

MR. MCKINLEY'S PLEDGES TO BIMETALLISM.

It was naturally to be expected that President McKinley would willingly carry into effect these six saving words in the platform upon which he was elected. On November 5, 1877, while a member of the House of Representatives, he voted in favor of a motion to suspend the rules and pass a bill for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. The vote was—yeas 163, nays 34 (RECORD, volume 6, page 241); and the bill passed the House. The Senate amended it by striking out the free-coinage clause and providing for the purchase monthly of not less than two nor more than four million dollars' worth of silver bullion and for coining it into dollars. Mr. McKinley voted to concur in the Senate amendment. President Hayes vetoed the bill, but on February 28, 1878, Mr. McKinley voted to pass it over the veto of the President—yeas 196, nays 73 (RECORD, volume 7, part 2, page 1420); and it passed the Senate also—yeas 46, nays 19 (page 1411), and became a law.

On January 28, 1878, Mr. McKinley voted for the passage of the Stanley Matthews resolution, to which allusion will hereafter be made. In 1890 he advocated the bullion-purchase bill, and his speeches were all in favor of the remonetization of silver. On June 24, 1890 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 21, part 7, page 6447), he said:

I am for the largest use of silver in the currency of the country. I would not dishonor it. I would give it equal credit and honor with gold. I would make no discrimination. I would utilize both metals as money and discredit neither. I want the double standard.

The result of this controversy was the passage of the act of July 14, 1890, for the purchase of four and one-half millions of ounces of silver bullion monthly.

Mr. McKinley also in his speech to the Ohio Republican League at Toledo on February 12, 1891, denounced President Cleveland because he was hostile to silver, and used this most remarkable language:

During all of his years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of our precious metals, one of our own great products, discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored even before his inauguration to office to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards, and to the end of his Administration, persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce and therefore dear. He would have increased the value of money and diminished the value of everything else—money the master, everything else its servant. He was not thinking of "the poor" then. He had left "their side." He was not "standing forth in their defense." Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money; the sponsor and promoter of these professing to stand guard over the welfare of the poor and lowly! Was there ever more glaring inconsistency or reckless assumption?

THE PENDING INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The latest pledge of the Republican party to bimetallicism is contained in the act of March 3, 1897, which authorized President McKinley to seek to secure "by international agreement a fixity of relative value between gold and silver as money by means of a common ratio between those metals with free mintage at such ratio," and appropriated $100,000 for the expenses of the movement.

This act was adopted by the Senate on January 29, 1897—46 for it to 4 against it (Senators ALLEN, PETTIGREW, ROACH, and VILAS); and in the House of Representatives February 26, 1897—281 for it to 4 against it (Representatives HENRY of Connecticut, JOHNSON of Indiana, KNOX, and QUIGG), and was signed by President Cleveland.

In pursuance of this law, our colleague, Senator WOLCOTT, Gen. Charles J. Paine, and the late Vice-President, Adlai E. Stevenson, were appointed special envoys to visit and negotiate with European countries. An account of the progress of their mission up to the present time is to be found in the speech of the Senator from Colorado delivered in the Senate on the 17th day of January of the present year.

Briefly that history is as follows: France through her ministers gave ready expression to the national desire that the monetary condition of the world should be restored to that which existed in 1873 and prior thereto, and it was agreed that the French ambassador at London and the American envoys should ascertain what England would do toward accomplishing the end which the envoys had been directed to secure.

While the British ministry held the subject under consideration the opinion of the council for India was taken. The Bank of England was also asked whether that institution would contribute toward bimetalism an agreement to hold, according to the bank-charter act of 1844, one-fourth of the bank's reserve in silver. On July 29, 1897, the bank replied affirmatively. On September 16 the council for India replied adversely, on the following grounds:

We have given very careful consideration to the question whether France and the United States are likely, with the help of India, to be able to maintain the relative value of gold and silver permanently at the ratio they intend to adopt, and have come to the conclusion that while we admit a possibility of the arrangements proposed resulting in the permanent maintenance of the value of gold and silver at the ratio of 15½ to 1, the probability is that they will fail to secure that result and that it is quite impossible to hold that there is anything approaching a practical certainty of their doing so. One reason for this conclusion is that the arrangement would rest on too narrow a basis.

A union consisting of two countries, with a third lending assistance, is a very different thing from the general international union of all or of most of the important countries of the world, which was advocated by the Government of India in the dispatches of March and June, 1892, and of February and September, 1893.

The council for India, however, suggested further consideration of the subject by saying:

If, however, assurances of really substantial cooperation should be secured from other countries, we shall be glad to learn the exact nature of the assurances, and we shall then consider whether the promised cooperation changes the conditions of the problem or adds materially to the chances of success.

The British Government, on the 19th day of October, concurring in the opinion of the council for India, through Lord Salisbury, communicated the conclusion to our ambassador, Mr. Hay, stating the reason, as follows:

If, owing to the relative smallness of the area over which the bimetallic system is to be established, to the great divergence between the proposed ratio and the present gold price of silver, or to any other cause, the legal ratio were not maintained, the position of silver might be much worse than before, and the financial embarrassments of the Government of India greater than any with which they have as yet had to contend.

But Lord Salisbury also invited further conferences by saying:

Her Majesty's Government are, therefore, desirous to ascertain how far the views of the American and French Governments are modified by the decision now arrived at, and whether they desire to proceed further with the negotiations at the present moment. It is possible that the time which has elapsed since the proposals were put forward in July last may have enabled the representatives of the two Governments concerned to form a more accurate estimate than was then practicable of the amount of assistance which they may expect from other powers and of the success which their scheme is likely to attain. Her Majesty's Government might then be placed in a position to consider the subject with a fuller knowledge than they now possess of many circumstances materially affecting the proposals before them.

The American envoys, however, concluded not then to argue further, but to return to Paris, where, after a consultation with the French ministry, it was decided to suspend further conferences for a time, and our envoys came home.

Referring to the conferences which had thus been initiated and suspended, President McKinley, in his annual message to Congress on the 6th day of December, 1897, declared that further negotiations were in contemplation; he recognized the gratifying action of our great sister Republic of France in joining this country in the attempt to secure a fixed and relative value between gold and silver, and he expressed the earnest hope that the labors of the special envoys might result in an "international agreement which will bring about recognition of both gold and silver as money."

SECRETARY GAGE'S BLOWS AT THE CONFERENCE.

But this concise narrative by no means gives a complete idea of what has taken place. The Senator from Colorado seems to admit that the adverse report of the council for India would alone have led to the temporary refusal of the British ministry to give satisfactory assurances to the French ambassador and American envoys, and the Senator does not assert that the embarrassments which the envoys experienced from the representations made by New York bankers in England that American public sentiment in favor of bimetalism had declined and that the governmental mission was insincere had any marked effect in producing the unfavorable answer of England.

Mr. President, I am not so charitably disposed. While I will not positively assert that the English reply would have been different if it had not been for the adverse influences going from the United States at the crucial moment of the negotiations, yet I do maintain that if it had not been for such influences there is great probability that a different answer might have been made, and I declare my conviction that the experiment of procuring assistance for international bimetalism from the English Government was not fairly tried.

The Bank of England's announcement of its willingness, if the Government so desired, to hold one-fifth of its reserves in silver, although dated July 29, 1897, was not publicly known until the fact was asserted by a correspondent of the London Times on September 11. Prior to this time there had been in the United States little fear of success for the mission among its enemies, the single gold standard advocates. The money men of New York and Chicago had felt sure that the envoys could not possibly accomplish anything. They had been content to let them go forward without hostile demonstrations openly made, but as soon as this answer of the Bank of England showed that international bimetalism was indeed progressing steps were taken from this side of the ocean to arrest such progress.

Immediately representations were made in London that the mission of our envoys was mere form and that the Administration did not really desire that it should succeed. Simultaneously with these representations, and for fear that quiet efforts would not avail to prevent a favorable reply by the British ministry, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage, took the field openly in person. From an interview with him of September 18, 1897, contained in the Chicago Tribune, I make the following extracts:

The proposal which comes from a director of the Bank of England to increase the use of silver, without interfering with the English gold standard, does not strike me as being important one way or the other. . . . There is also a stipulation that France must again open its mints to the free coinage of silver. That will never come to pass so long as silver prices are so low as to make the French authorities fear a further depreciation in the value of the enormous stocks of silver in that country.

The Director of the Mint, Mr. Preston, had been earlier in the field, and on the 6th of August, 1897, in the Boston Herald, had made these declarations: "If we had only the one standard, the gold standard, money would be cheaper and more plentiful." "I see no future for silver whatever." "Outside of the United States all nations want to go to the gold standard."

These public and widespread declarations of Messrs. Preston and Gage seemed to me to be so clearly intended to defeat the mission of the envoys that I hastened to ask the President to take steps to counteract these treacherous blows of his Treasury subordinates, and I wrote to him a letter dated September 21, 1897, which is as follows:

WATERLOO, N. H., September 21, 1897.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The first result of the mission of our special envoys to Europe in behalf of bimetalism was the ready declaration of the French ministry that France, equally with the United States, desired a return to the monetary system existing prior to 1873, and it was agreed that it should be ascertained what aid toward that result would be given by England and other European governments. The second result is the recent decision of the Bank of England to render such aid by keeping a portion of the bank's reserve in silver, as authorized by existing law, and undoubtedly the English ministry is now considering, among various other plans, whether to offer to reopen the India mints to the free coinage of rupees.

This decision of the bank being made public and the other questions being under consideration, there has been telegraphed to Europe from an interview in the Chicago Tribune of September 18, 1897, a greeting from Secretary Gage, as follows:

"The proposal which comes from a director of the Bank of England to increase the use of silver without interfering with the English gold standard does not strike me as being important one way or the other. Mr. Hugh Smith, the bank governor and author of the communication to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, makes the all-important reservation that the prices at which silver is procurable and salable must be satisfactory."

"The bank's directors are men of the widest financial experience. They would be good judges of what is satisfactory price for carrying silver. And with such proper precautions there would be no danger that the bank would ever take in or pay out money which, according to an American equivalent, would not be worth 100 cents on the dollar."

"There is also a stipulation that France must again open its mints to the free coinage of silver. That will never come to pass so long as silver prices are so low as to make the French authorities fear a further depreciation in the value of the enormous stocks of silver in that country. I believe that France is anxious for a coinage agreement, but I think that country would not care to go into the silver business until England and Germany do."

"Our bimetallic commissioners are now abroad, and of course it would not be fair for me to express an opinion in advance on what they may succeed in accomplishing."

It is impossible to conceive of any more damaging blow at the mission of your envoys than the foregoing. In all sincerity I can say that to carry out the exact spirit of the interview I believe the words "and of course it would not be fair for me to express an opinion in advance," etc., should be superseded by the words "and in order to defeat the object of their mission I desire to express an opinion in advance," etc. It is impossible for me to believe that Secretary Gage could have deliberately uttered the words attributed to him (and I should send this letter to you through him if he were now with you), but the report of this utterance and others of his going uncontradicted is likely to be as fatal to the object of your envoys as if he had signed the announcements.

Director of the Mint Preston is constantly quoted in the newspapers as opposed to your policy on this subject. Be kind enough to read the following extracts from Director Preston's interview, dated August 6, 1897, in the Boston Herald:

"If we had only the one standard—the gold standard—money would be cheaper and more plentiful." "I see no future for silver whatever." "Outside of the United States all nations want to go to the gold standard."

Mr. President, it has given me delight at all times to say that you have always sincerely acted in full accordance with the expressions of your letter of December 23, 1896, addressed to Senators HOAR, GEAR, CARTER, and myself, and with other similar declarations that you were not only determined to seek but desirous to secure international bimetalism; and I am sure our envoys are governed only by your written and oral instructions, while any conclusions reached by them are necessarily to be submitted as recommendations to you and to Congress.

Nevertheless it is due to truth to say that if utterances like those of Secretary Gage and Director Preston go unrepudiated by you it will be impossible to secure success for the mission of the envoys; mainly, if not entirely, because of the doubts created as to whether the United States movement is in earnest—is not, in fact, a mere pretense designed for political effect at home and not to accomplish results abroad. The greatest difficulties our envoys are meeting are the concerted outcries that public men with professions of a wish to restore bimetalism on their lips are at heart far from wishing success to the cause they appear to acquiesce in or advocate.

Mr. President, this is a crisis in our movement, because England has announced her willingness to help it, and the gold monometallists are making a fatal blow against us which is being given in the name of your Administration: or if you can not do this because you have changed your convictions and desires on this great subject, will you not withdraw the envoys, frankly assume the responsibility of formally abandoning the bimetallic plank of the St. Louis platform, and let us take the consequences? Better this sad result than that the movement should be secretly or openly stabbed to death by Republicans under your control.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. CHANDLER.

To the President, North Adams, Mass.

To this letter I received no reply; the President made no public utterance in favor of the work of his envoys, but allowed the damage to be done which resulted from the Gage and Preston outcries.

THE INDIANAPOLIS GOLD-STANDARD PROJECT.

It is further to be remembered that a voluntary meeting of business men, so called, had met at Indianapolis, and on January 13, 1897, had recommended to Congress the appointment of a monetary commission, and had also declared in favor of the gold standard, as follows:

This conference declares that it has become absolutely necessary that a consistent, straightforward, and deliberately planned monetary system shall be inaugurated, the fundamental basis of which should be: "First. That the present gold standard should be maintained."

The report of this commission the President, on the 24th day of July, 1897, had commended "to the consideration of Congress" by a special message with no dissent, express or implied, from the declarations in favor of the gold standard. He further recommended the appointment of a special commission to carry on the work of this voluntary assemblage; and on the day of receiving the message the House of Representatives, by a vote of 126 to 90, passed a joint resolution providing for the appointment of a monetary commission of eleven members and appropriating $100,000 for its expenses; which resolution, however, was not acted upon in the Senate, and Congress adjourned on the same day.

The House had made haste to strike the desired blow at the mission of the envoys; the Senate declined to join in the crusade. Without the permission of the Senator from Colorado, I will venture to say that on the 14th day of October—two days before the adverse decision of the India office—he was called upon to explain the President's indorsement of the Indianapolis gold declaration, and he loyally defended his chief. But it was too late. The poison had done its worst. Thenceforth the remainder of the deadly work was committed to Secretary Gage, who performed it with perfect impunity and great boldness. The Washington correspondent of the London Chronicle was his accurate mouthpiece—by design or accident—when he telegraphed to the Chronicle on September 20, 1897—mark well the date—as follows:

No one here has ever believed that an international agreement relating to silver could be brought about or that bimetalism could be accomplished. President McKinley sent the commissioners abroad to satisfy the moderate silver men of his own party and to be able to tell them that bimetalism is impossible because England refuses to join in the scheme.

A gentleman closely connected with the work of the envoys sent me the above extract and wrote me as follows:

Secretary Gage's utterances and those of Eckels and Preston did serious mischief in England, more even than the conservative statements in Senator WELCH's speech suggest. They lent a certain likelihood to the uniformly hostile dispatches which came from the American correspondents of London papers and so not only influenced middle-class opinion but even penetrated into high places.

Mr. President, the result of all these movements to discredit and defeat the mission of the envoys at the first moment when signs of success began to appear was discouragement to the friends of bimetalism the world over. Everywhere the gold monometallists proclaimed that international bimetalism had been a myth and now had come to its final death.

The Senator from Colorado, who is loyal to the President whose commission he held and whose sincerity he will not question, but defends, used cautious expressions in describing the effect of Secretary Gage's public declarations. But it was unmistakable. The Senator and everyone connected with him in the movement for international bimetalism appeared to be placed in the position of having engaged in a mere perfunctory effort to carry out the pledges of the St. Louis platform, which were to be abandoned on the slightest pretext and at the earliest possible moment and to be no more heard of in the councils of the Republican party.

SECRETARY GAGE'S LAST BLOW AT BIMETALLISM.

But the whole story is not yet told. After the Secretary of the Treasury had done his best to defeat the object which the President's envoys had been directed to secure, and they had returned to the United States, he further determined to "make secure," and to strike a final and deadly blow at the American movement for bimetalism. He prepared a currency bill to be submitted to the committees of Congress which did not need as its basis any declaration against international bimetalism or in favor of gold monometallism, but was, as he himself afterwards claimed, entirely consistent with the system of bimetalism, and with this plan of what he called currency reform in his hand he appeared before the House Committee on Banking and Currency on the 16th day of December, 1897, and declared that the first object of his bill was to commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard. This is his opening utterance and exact language:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the objects I have in mind in the series of provisions offered by me are four in number:

1. To commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard, remove, so far as possible, doubts and fears on that point, and thus strengthen the credit of the United States both at home and abroad.

Mr. President, since this last hostile blow of Secretary Gage at the St. Louis platform and at the movement of the President to secure bimetalism, it has been up-hill work to try to convince anyone that even the President himself has intended sincerely and earnestly to pursue negotiations for an international agreement to secure a fixed ratio between gold and silver with the free coinage of both metals at that ratio.

THE REPUBLICAN VOTES AGAINST REAFFIRMING THE STANLEY MATTHEWS RESOLUTION.

But further and worse blows at bimetalism were yet to come. Secretary Gage had many allies in the Republican party.

On the 28th day of January, 1898, all but seven Republicans in the Senate, and on January 31 all but one Republican in the House of Representatives voted against reaffirming what is known as the Stanley Matthews resolution of 1878, and the resolution of reaffirmation, which passed the Senate by 47 yeas to 32 nays, a majority of 15, was defeated in the House by a Republican majority of 49—138 yeas to 183 nays.

This defeated resolution simply declared two things:

1. That the United States Government bonds are payable at the option of the Government in standard silver dollars.

2. That to restore silver to coinage as legal tender in payment of the bonds is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

The first statement is a uniformly admitted truth. The second is also conceded by those who voted against it to be a just and honest principle, provided there is no intention on the part of those who vote for it to so restore silver to coinage as to make a silver dollar worth less than a gold dollar; in other words, so as to destroy the parity between the two kinds of coin. It is a sound principle, its opponents say, if its friends have one intention as to the future; it is dishonest if they have a different intention. To this subtlety there is a simple, comprehensive, and conclusive reply: That no one of its friends admits that he contemplates a return of silver to coinage which will break the parity between the two kinds of dollars. Every one denies any such intention, and declares his purpose to maintain the public honor in the establishment of our national monetary system as scrupulously as do those who voted for the resolution in 1878 and vote now against it.

MR. MCKINLEY'S VOTE FOR THE STANLEY MATTHEWS RESOLUTION.

At the front of the 180 Representatives who so voted for the resolution in 1878 was William McKinley, now President of the United States. At the head of the Senators who so voted was WILLIAM B. ALLESTON, followed by the Republican Senators, Newton Booth, of California; J. D. Cameron, of Pennsylvania; Angus Cameron, of Wisconsin; David Davis, of Illinois; Thomas W. Ferry, of Michigan; Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin; Samuel J. Kirkwood, of Iowa; S. J. McMillan, of Minnesota; Stanley Matthews, of Ohio, and Richard J. Oglesby, of Illinois. The resolution passed both Houses of Congress—the Senate on January 25, 1878 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 7, part 1, page 561), yeas 43, nays 22; the House January 28 (ibid., page 626), yeas 180, nays 79.

Mr. President, I demand to know what there is to make the passage of this resolution, which was honest and honorable in January, 1878, dishonest and dishonorable in January, 1898. It declares, as has been already shown, nothing that is not true. On the contrary, it asserts the simple truth. Mr. Blaine said January 25, 1878 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 7, part 1, page 559):

That the bonds are payable in either coin seems to me to be just as plain as the alphabet. . . . I believe it is not strengthening the public credit nor the interest of the public creditor to deny that on the letter of the statute these bonds are payable in either coin.

The New York Sun, through Mr. Matthew Marshall, writing on January 31, 1898, as to the resolution of this year, says:

A review of the whole debate shows beyond doubt the impregnable technical position of the silverites. . . . On this indisputably correct literal interpretation of the contract between the Government and its bondholders the silverite Senators planted themselves and could not be induced to abandon it.

THE TRUTH AND HONESTY OF THE RESOLUTION.

It is very difficult to understand upon what logical ground the opponents of the resolution can demonstrate that what was true and honest twenty years ago is, although still true, yet now dishonest. In the Senate before making arguments against it they endeavored to extract from its advocates admissions that they looked eventually to the free coinage of silver by the United States alone, and then denounced the resolution because of the assumption that it meant the free coinage of silver by the United States alone.

Yet the resolution says nothing of that sort. It may mean coinage only after an international agreement. Furthermore, no one of the most zealous advocates of the coinage of silver by the United States alone—independent bimetallism, as they call it—admits that it will break the parity between the two metals; but all maintain the contrary and assert that the parity should be and will be maintained.

The opponents of the resolution also said that what might have been an honest declaration in 1878 was dishonest in 1898, because circumstances had changed. Is this a just contention? When the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and Mr. McKinley voted for the resolution in 1878, the market value of silver in a dollar was 92 cents. It is now said to be only 44 cents. Does this difference between an 8 per cent reduction in the value of a dollar and a 53 per cent reduction make the difference between the honest vote and the dishonest vote? Does the Senator from Iowa maintain that an 8 per cent child of dishonor is on the whole an honorable offspring, while the 56 per cent child of dishonor is without doubt a "monstrous" creation?

The whole argument against the resolution seems to me to have been absurd, so far as reasoning is concerned, and to have been based wholly upon unreasoning denunciation. When a true and reasonable declaration is being made, to ascribe a sinister purpose to the persons voting for it and to attempt thereupon to affix the stigma of dishonor upon the advocates of the declaration comes very near to being itself a dishonest and dishonorable act.

The simple truth is, Mr. President, that the resolution in 1878 and the same resolution in 1898 was merely a judicious reservation of an unquestionable right which the nation was not then and is not now called upon to surrender; that is to say, the right of the Government to create its own monetary system and to coin its money and regulate the value thereof, as commanded to do by the Constitution. The whole outcry against the resolution was unjust and unreasonable and will in the end react upon its authors.

SILVER COINS AS HONEST AS LEGAL TENDERS.

Mr. President, I can not better show the absurdity of assailing those Republicans who voted that to restore silver to coinage would not be a violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor than by calling attention to the action of the Republican party in maintaining the right of the nation to issue paper money and make the same legal tender for all private debts. Contrast the two principles: One is the right to coin silver and make it a legal tender when the right is expressly reserved in the contract with the public creditor, the expectation being that the silver bullion in the silver dollar will always be worth the quantity of gold in the gold dollar. The other is the right to start the printing presses and convert absolutely valueless paper into money without limiting the quantity of its issue and to make such paper unlimited legal tender. If the purpose to maintain the right to coin silver is dishonest, what shall be said of the purpose to maintain the right to pay all debts in worthless paper?

THE SUPREME COURT AND THE LEGAL TENDERS.

Yet the maintenance of this latter right was admitted to be so important that the Republican party did not hesitate to reorganize the Supreme Court of the United States in order to assert and preserve the principle that the country could issue irredeemable paper money without limit. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] does not like to hear it said that the Republicans packed the Supreme Court in order to reverse its first decision, which pronounced legal tenders to be unconstitutional.

The Senator from Massachusetts may substitute any other verb and I will use it, but the facts remain the same and are unmistakable in their character. The constitutionality of the legal-tender laws came before the Supreme Court for the first time in the case of Hepburn vs. Griswold, in 8 Wallace Reports, 603. The legal tenders were held to be unconstitutional by five judges; four were original Democrats—Justices Nelson, Grier, Clifford, and Field—and the opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Chase, who had become a Democrat. The dissenting justices were Swayne, Miller, and Davis, who were Republicans. The case was decided in conference on November 27, 1869; the opinion was announced February 8, 1870.

On April 10, 1869, the Republican Congress had increased the number of judges from eight to nine, and on February 18, 1870, Mr. Justice Strong was appointed in the place of Mr. Justice Grier, who had resigned on February 1, 1870, and on March 21, 1870, Mr. Justice Bradley was appointed as the ninth judge. Thereupon the question was for a second time brought before the court with the result announced under the title of the "Legal-tender Cases," 12 Wallace, 457 (Knox vs. Lee, Parker vs. Davis). The decision was made May 1, 1871, although the opinion was not delivered until January 15, 1872. It reverses the decision in Hepburn vs. Griswold, as follows: Mr. Justice Strong, who delivered the opinion, with Swayne, Miller, Davis, and Bradley, made the majority, while Chief Justice Chase with Nelson, Clifford, and Field were the minority.

It is as clear as light that the Republican party pursued its determination to establish the right of the Government to issue legal tenders without limit as an act of political policy. Does anyone doubt that it was perfectly well understood that Judges Strong and Bradley would join their Republican associates upon the bench and reverse the decision that the legal-tender laws were unconstitutional?

But this is not all. The first decision had been adverse—5 to 3; the second decision had been favorable—5 to 4. In the progress of ten years the Republican party obtained all the judges upon the Supreme Court bench with the exception of one. Then the question was brought for a third time into court in the case of Juliliard vs. Greenman (110 U. S. Reports, 421), and on the 2d day of March, 1884, it was again decided that legal-tender notes were constitutional in war times or in peace times; Mr. Justice Gray delivering the opinion, sustained by Chief Justice Waite and Justices Harlan, Woods, Matthews, Blatchford, Bradley, and Miller—eight justices, with only one, Mr. Justice Field, in the minority.

Mr. President, this is all a plain book. The Republican party through Republican judges pursued its political purposes until it secured beyond the reach of reasonable controversy and opposition the declaration of the right of the country to print greenbacks without limit and without redemption, and make them a legal tender for all the debts due among the citizens of the Union; and so important to the national sovereignty, security, and prosperity was this right deemed that no rest was given to the assertion of the principle until it was declared by the highest court to be applicable not merely to notes issued in a great national exigency of war but also to notes issued in time of profound peace.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in view of this record those Senators who would not be willing to surrender the principle of the uncontrolled right of the Government to issue legal-tender notes in peace as well as in war should refrain from attributing a discreditable purpose to those Senators who think it equally important to maintain without impairment the uncontrolled right of the Government to create the coined money of the country, and, in accordance with the Constitution, to make it a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except where it is otherwise nominated in the bond. The national honor is not in danger in either case. The Congress that can be trusted with power to issue legal-tender notes without intrinsic value can be trusted to make the coinage laws of the country.

BIMETALLISTS MUST BE IN EARNEST.

At all events, Mr. President, the votes in favor of the resolution were votes in behalf of international bimetallism. It is of very little use to go to England asking for an international agreement to restore silver to the coinage, if we tender in advance to the English Government emphatic assurances that if she refuses our requests we shall nevertheless maintain and adhere permanently to the single gold standard. It is undoubtedly for the interest of the British Empire as a whole, including the vast possessions in India, that silver should be restored to free coinage.

It is almost a necessity for the welfare of the people of India; but they do not possess the suffrage, and can not, therefore, give full and effective expression to their sentiments. It is also for the interest of the agriculturists and the manufacturers and other producers in the English islands. But it is probably not for the interest of the bankers, money lenders, and many persons belonging to the governing classes in England. They prefer and will be benefited by the single gold standard.

Therefore, I repeat that to go to the English rulers asking for bimetallism, with a promise that if they do not grant the request all efforts for silver shall cease and that the United States will become a gold monometallist nation, is a most foolish errand. We have made declarations enough in favor of the gold standard and that we will maintain the parity of the coins of the two metals. What is needed is an earnest and sincere declaration in favor of the double standard, in favor of bimetallism as it existed throughout the world in 1873 and prior thereto.

THE ST. LOUIS PLATFORM.

In this respect the St. Louis platform was very far from being what was desirable. There is contained in it the unique declaration just spoken of, most unwise in the face of an international conference, that we will maintain the existing gold standard if we can not get international bimetallism. There is the further strange declaration—I wonder who was the author—that the gold standard is the standard of the most enlightened nations of the world. So we sent envoys to Europe to propose that this standard of the enlightened nations should be changed for a standard necessarily assumed to be that of the unenlightened or the barbarous nations of the world!

The platform was, therefore, not satisfactory to Republican bimetalists. Yet, as it contained the six saving words referring to bimetalism—"which we pledge ourselves to promote"—it was accepted by hundreds of thousands of Republicans as one which should hold them to their own party as against the heterogeneous opposition. Without the Republicans thus held Mr. McKinley would not have been elected. With a more emphatic declaration in favor of bimetalism the United States Senate would have been saved to the Republicans.

The pledge to promote bimetalism was taken up by President McKinley with the results which have already been alluded to, and he to-day professes his intention to pursue the quest for international bimetalism. The search will be without avail if Secretary Gage is to be allowed to stab the movement at every turn, and the world at large is to be thereby and by the votes of the Republicans of Congress convinced that the whole American movement for international bimetalism is a mere political subterfuge, to be discredited on the slightest pretext and to be discontinued at the earliest possible moment. I voted in favor of the resolution which passed the Senate on January 28, 1898, declaring that the United States has not promised its creditors that it will not restore silver to coinage, because I believe the reservation and assertion of all the ancient rights of the Government connected with its monetary system are important to any further effort to secure international bimetalism, while every vote against the resolution was an additional hindrance in the way of international bimetalism.

BLUNDERS MUST BE REMEDIED—BIMETALLISM MUST BE RESOUGHT.

Mr. President, the calamitous situation is simply this: By reason of the recent blundering action of the Republican party on the subject of bimetalism, to which attention has been so fully called, namely, the almost unanimous vote of its members in the two Houses of Congress against a declaration of the right of the Government according to its discretion and judgment to restore silver to coinage—which vote appears strange and inconsistent when it is recalled that the Republican party only recently pursued the Supreme Court of the United States with unrelenting determination until that court was forced to a judicial declaration of the right of the Government according to its discretion and judgment to issue paper legal tenders in unlimited quantities to be the money of the people in time of peace as well as in time of war—a widespread belief has been created in this country and throughout the world that the Republican party wholly abandons the pursuit of bimetalism and proposes to give up the use of silver coins as standard money, leaving the silver dollars only metallic promises to pay gold dollars, and to submit without further resistance to a permanent adoption of gold as the only standard money of the United States.

To remove this fatal belief, if it is a mistaken belief, and if the Republican party is not to make its future political contests as a single gold standard party, it is of the highest importance that the leaders of the party should very soon in clear, distinct, and unmistakable utterances proclaim their renewed opposition to gold monometallism and their determination to continue the pursuit of bimetalism. This may be most appropriately done by the declaration in the pending war-revenue bill which I have ventured to suggest. I repeat my hope that by the substantially unanimous vote of all parties the declaration may be adopted without delay.

BIMETALLISM CAN BE ESTABLISHED.

I am aware that of the Republican supporters of the proposed declaration the question may be fairly asked whether there are reasonable expectations that bimetalism can be established as the world's system of money. "You admit," it will be said, "that unlimited free silver coinage by the United States alone at this time would break the parity between the two kinds of metallic money, would send gold to a premium, and would be for a time at least the establishment of silver monometallism and not of bimetalism." What prospect remains that a sufficient number of the nations of the world will join in the movement for bimetalism to secure its successful adoption? My answer is that the cause of bimetalism is a hopeful one.

ENGLAND MAY YET ASSIST.

England may yet conclude to assist in the remonetization of silver. There should be borne in mind the exact circumstances under which in October last international negotiations were suspended as they appear in the extracts from the correspondence which I have read. The adverse argument of the India council and of Lord Salisbury was based upon two assumptions:

I. That France and the United States alone, if England would use silver as one-fourth of her bank reserve and open the India mints, intended to admit silver to free coinage in their mints without awaiting negotiations with other nations.

This assumption was a mistake. The French and American negotiators had made it a part of their fundamental plan that after an agreement by England covering the two points the joint efforts of France and the United States should be directed to negotiations with Germany and the other European countries, and that no final conclusions should be reached until after such negotiations.

II. The other assumption was that France and the United States envoys had unitedly determined that the ratio should be 15½ to 1. That was true, tentatively. The understanding was that it should be ascertained what England, Germany, and other nations would contribute toward remonetization with the 15½ ratio, and necessarily it would have been unwise and not good faith on the part of our envoys to open the subject of a change of ratio in the condition of the question then existing.

But the extracts from the history of the negotiations already given show that the India council and the home Government desired and expected that negotiations would be continued on the theory that additional governments might give strength to the movement and that a change of ratio might possibly be suggested; notwithstanding which the joint French and American conclusion was to temporarily suspend conferences and await the result of certain future probabilities.

INDIA MAY NOT BE BROUGHT TO A GOLD STANDARD.

It is not for me to predict the final outcome of the determination of the English Government to allow the council for India to attempt to establish the gold standard in that part of the Empire. But it is worth while to consider for a moment the cruel process which the council have lately presented to the British ministers as necessary to be applied to the people of India in order to force the single gold standard upon that dependency. The council propose to take from time to time silver rupees from the circulation and melt them and sell the bullion for gold until 24 crores of rupees, or about $110,000,000 worth, are destroyed. The gold realized will be about $50,000,000, and there will be a contraction of the currency of India of about one-fifth. The scarcity of money thus produced is expected to make the rupees remaining outstanding worth par in gold, the present bullion value of a 45-cent rupee being about 19 cents, and the value as maintained by the Government, or the gold value, being about 32 cents.

The $50,000,000 realized by the India government is to be kept in the treasury as a gold reserve with which to maintain the gold standard after contraction of the money has made the rupee worth 45 cents in gold; and as the government is unable to raise from the impoverished people the sums necessary to purchase the rupees which are to be melted and sold for gold, the home government is asked to borrow in London and send to India from time to time the £20,000,000 sterling in gold estimated as necessary to make the movement a safe one.

There is a great outcry in England against this plan of the India council, not so much because overburdened India is to be subjected to the injuries resulting from a contraction of the currency and a continued fall in prices as well as the ultimate burdens of the loan of £20,000,000, but because the home Government is expected to assume and carry the loan in the first instance.

Sir Robert Giffen, the greatest advocate in England of the gold standard for that country, the author of the book, The Case Against Bimetalism, is opposed to the gold standard for India. In a letter to the London Times of May 10, 1898, which I will ask to have printed as an appendix to my remarks and also as a Senate document, he states several propositions which will be interesting to our United States single gold standard advocates. He says:

I. That a gold standard is impossible for India.

II. That a poor and heavily indebted country, having large payments to make annually to foreign creditor countries with a gold standard, can not wisely have the same money as the creditor country. If it is gold, that gold will rapidly go away, and the steady drain will contract and disturb the money market until the situation becomes intolerable.

III. In the case of such a country, however, when the money is different the competition for exchange on the creditor country lowers the value of the money compared with the creditor's money and thereby lowers also the value of all goods in the debtor country compared with the creditor's money. The result is the export of goods suitable for the creditor country, so that the foreign debts are paid with those goods and the money of the debtor country is not acted upon at all, but remains at home in full volume.

IV. He cites countries which resemble India, but perhaps are not so poor, which have attempted a gold standard and have failed: (1) Italy fifteen years ago obtained a gold loan of £10,000,000 in order to introduce the gold standard, but failed of success; (2) the Argentine Republic twice failed; also (3) Brazil, (4) Chile, (5) Spain, (6) Austria, and (7) Russia have failed for similar reasons.

V. In truth he asserts "that the Indian government does not face the problem of adopting the gold standard. It tries to do the business on the cheap by creating at an enormous cost to the mercantile community of India an artificial scarcity of currency, so as to force the community to accept gold; but that is a still more costly method in reality, as the process may ruin the country."

VI. Instead of allowing, as the India council says, that the £20,000,000 in gold England is asked to loan to India will be sufficient to establish the gold standard for India, he says "a sum of £50,000,000 should at least be accumulated beforehand," but that naming that sum shows "the practical impossibility of the operation at the present time."

In a letter from Mr. William Fowler, appended to Sir Robert Giffen's letter in the Times, the writer describes the scheme proposed by the Indian government as one of "money murder," showing "the strange indifference shown by the government to the interests of the multitude of holders of silver in India and to the agonies of the money markets there;" and he also speaks of the first export from England of £5,000,000 in gold, to begin the work, as likely to have "very serious consequences;" and he mentions Mr. H. D. McLeod's estimate that £100,000,000 is necessary and Mr. David Yule's estimate of £77,000,000. He concludes that, as the action of the government of India in 1893 in closing the mints caused something like a panic there, the greatest care at this time is necessary in order to avoid "alarm and panic" in England.

I ask that Sir Robert Giffen's letter may be printed as an appendix to my remarks and also as a Senate document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. CHANDLER. By considering what would be the effect in this country of a reduction of its money by one-fifth, we can understand something of the effect likely to be produced in India by the proposed scheme for compelling her helpless people to submit to the gold standard. Should the plan fail, and the monetary distress and misery of the people there existing continue and find a voice, England will gladly reopen the question of the remonetization of silver by international action. Moreover, other events not now to be foreshadowed at length may soon incline that Government to give up its present policy of bringing all the nations of the world to adopt the gold standard and to discard silver as standard money.

FRANCE WILL NEVER YIELD TO THE GOLD STANDARD.

One thing is certain, France will never yield to the gold standard, but will persistently pursue bimetalism. The recent French elections have given to the present ministry a new and long lease of power; and Mr. Meline, the premier, one of the most enlightened and fearless statesmen of the present day, is a bimetalist from full study and with unflinching conviction. France is likely at any moment to suggest to the United States a renewal of the suspended negotiations. Whether time and reflection have convinced the bimetalists of France that it will be wise and expedient to assent to a change of ratio from 15½ to 20, or 22, or 24 to 1 I have no knowledge. My individual opinion is that even without England's direct cooperation there can be a safe remonetization of silver by France and the United States, not acting alone, but in conjunction with some of the European nations, with all the nations of the Western Hemisphere, and with China and other Asiatic forces.

A GOOD CAUSE ALWAYS HOPEFUL.

Mr. President, there is always reason for the friends of what they believe to be a good cause to hope in spite of apparent adverse circumstances that triumph may eventually come. It is my abiding belief that the whole world can not be brought to the single gold standard and held fixedly to such a system of money. The full and final disuse of silver as standard money would bring injuries, evils, and miseries to the human race greater, more penetrating, and more enduring than any one of the military wars and devastations which history records.

If silver coins are not to be real money, but only token money or subsidiary money, which must, like paper money, be at all times when demand is made redeemed in gold money, it will soon cease to exist as money of any quality. There is no possible need of using silver in order to stamp upon it promises to pay gold dollars. For such promises merely paper is better than silver and will in the end, under the gold standard, be the only money used except gold. "Metallic greenbacks" are no better, are not so good as paper greenbacks, and they will finally disappear from existence as money.

THE VAST LOSS FROM DEMONETIZING SILVER.

It is not unworthy of consideration—the question of the direct injury to be done by the destruction by demonetization of the values now contained in the silver coins and silver bullion of the world. There exist about four thousand millions of dollars of such coins and probably six thousand millions of silver bullion, making $10,000,000,000 in all of the world's stock of silver. The loss by the depreciation of this amount already since 1873 through demonetization has been six thousand millions of dollars; and if the process is still to go on until silver ceases to be any longer in any place used as standard money, its price will go down to its value for use only in the arts, possibly to 25 cents an ounce, and there will have been a loss to the owners of the silver of the world of $3,000,000,000.

Even the property rights of these silver owners whose past and prospective shrinkage of values reaches this enormous sum have some claim to the forbearance of the nations. It is true that much of the loss upon the coined silver may fall upon the governments which may redeem the coins in gold, but much the largest loss will fall upon individuals. It is unnecessary to repeat the well-known story of the woe which has been and is being inflicted upon the suffering millions of India whose savings have been invested in one thousand millions of ounces of silver bullion, and many of whom have been and are starving to death, not because there is not food enough to be bought, but because the value of their silver has been destroyed by the government and they have no money to buy food with.

THE ARGUMENT FOR BIMETALLISM.

But the direct loss—grievous as it is in certain aspects—from the demonetization of silver is of slight importance compared with the blighting effects upon the world's prosperity produced by the destruction as a measure of values of half of the world's metallic money.

It is no part of my purpose in these remarks, already too long, to restate at any length the arguments against the gold standard and in favor of bimetalism. In my speech in the Senate of February 16, 1897, I gave the reasons for the faith that was in me, and I have changed no one of the conclusions there avowed. The case for bimetalism, as I understand it, is this:

In 1873, after gold and silver had both been the standard money of the world for many centuries, various commercial nations began steps for discarding silver money and for continuing as the only metallic money of final redemption the other metal—gold.

This proceeding, while running its course, likely to require for completion from thirty to fifty years from its beginning, is having the effect of gradually and continuously reducing the prices of the property of the world, thereby discouraging trade, and of increasing the difficulties in paying debts, thereby causing an increase in the number of insolvencies in commercial circles and in the number of transfers of property from hopeless debtors to absorbing creditors.

When the full adjustment of commercial exchanges everywhere to the new monetary system is finally reached, so that the scarcer metallic money and the lower prices of property will apparently affect all classes equally, and so that all new debts will be contracted with reference to the new conditions, nevertheless, the quantity of metallic money of final redemption, being one-half of what it would be under the old system, yet continuing to be the principal factor in determining the average prices of property and in fixing the amount to be used of other forms of money and credits, will be too small for the safe and prudent transaction thereon of the commerce of the world, and money panics will increase in frequency, violence, and destructiveness, to the hindrance of trade and of the consequent growth of industries and of wealth. It is also to be apprehended that it will be found impossible to force all the nations to the single gold standard, and that the par of exchange will be permanently broken and the world divided into gold-standard nations and silver-standard nations.

The bimetalists further say, as the use of the two metals as final money has existed for more than two thousand years and the old monetary system for more than two hundred years, that the burden of proof is upon the gold monometalists to prove the inferiority of the old system and the superiority of the new one, which they say is not proved, and that the people of the free nations can, if they choose, by justifiable methods and successive and appropriate steps return to the old monetary system existing prior to 1873; acting no more with dishonesty than have acted the authors of the prolonged attempt ever since that date to establish a new monetary system of gold monometallism.

THE HIGH PRICE OF WHEAT NOT CONCLUSIVE.

This case for bimetalism is not seriously impaired by the high prices of wheat now prevailing. They result from short crops the world over. The general tendency of the average of all prices is steadily downward, notwithstanding the operation of temporary and special causes working the other way.

In my remarks of February 16, 1897, is contained the table of index numbers prepared for the Royal Statistical Society by Mr. Sauerbeck, covering the period from 1875 to 1895. In the London Statist for May 7, 1898 (page 767), there is to be found a summary of the results down to April, 1898, under the heading:

COMMODITY PRICE BAROMETER.

[By A. Sauerbeck.]

Index numbers of the prices of forty-five commodities, the average of the eleven years 1887-1897 being 100:

	Average.		Average.
1878-1887	70	July, 1896	100.3
1888-1897	67	December, 1896	62
1889	72	September, 1897	61.4
1890	68	December, 1897	61.4
1891	63	January, 1898	61.8
1892	62	February, 1898	63.4
1893	61	March, 1898	63
1894	63	April, 1898	65.5

The index number shows a substantial improvement, which is principally due to the advance in prices of wheat, flour, maize, and rice, equal to about 20 per cent in the course of the last month, and to the rise of Manila hemp from $19 to $20. Lead, copper, cotton, jute, and linseed oil are also somewhat dearer.

Taking articles of food and materials separately, the index numbers compare thus:

	1896.		1897.		1898.
	July.	Decem-ber.	Septem-ber.	Decem-ber.	March.	April.
Food.....	60	63.9	67.5	66.5	67.5	70.7
Materials.....	58.6	60.6	60.4	59.4	59.8	61.7

Articles of food are now in the aggregate 18 per cent higher than at the lowest time in 1896, while for materials the rise is only 5 per cent.

THE SLOW PROGRESS OF ECONOMIC CHANGES.

It was a principal part of my effort on February 10, under the text "The lowest fall in prices not yet reached"—as it is always the effort of bimetalists—to show that the progress of economic changes is slow. In reaching conclusions any conditions existing during short periods and any exceptional circumstances prove but little. It is the "long run" of the money system which must be scrutinized. Professor Cairnes, quoted by General Walker (Bimetallism, 243, 244, 245), speaks of the progressive effect upon prices of great changes in the money of the world as likely to "extend over some thirty or forty years." He says: "Certain classes of commodities and services will be affected much more powerfully than others."

There is, therefore, nothing in the great present rise in the price of food supplies to weaken the contention that a steady fall in average prices the world over is taking place. While the table above shows a rise in the general index number from the average of 62 in 1897 (to which it had fallen from 100 since the decade of 1867-1877) to 65 in April, 1898, yet when food and materials are taken separately all the temporary and exceptional facts become apparent. Food articles in July, 1896, had the index number 60; in April, 1898, the number 70; but the other commodities which had in July, 1896, the number 58 had risen in April, 1898, only to 61. I will only add on this point the remark that if progress toward the single gold standard is to continue and the prices of commodities as a whole expressed in terms of gold do not continue to fall as long periods elapse, bimetalists will be much mistaken and may be confronted with arguments difficult to answer.

The necessarily slow effect of the demonetization of silver by the nations in 1872 must be apparent to careful observers. The first action was only to close the mints to the new silver. Most of the four thousand millions of old silver coin remained as money, and all the new gold continued to be added to the world's stock of real money, so the total amount of metallic money, compared with the wants of the commercial world, diminished slowly. But now we are reaching a period when the four thousand millions of existing silver coin will begin to disappear as money. When it ceases to be real money—money which, like gold, needs not to be redeemed in any other kind of money—and is held to be only a promise to pay gold, it will be an utter waste to use it as money at all. It will cease to have any greater effect in determining prices than paper money or other credits have, and the world's measure of values will cease to be eight thousand millions of gold and silver combined and will be only four thousand millions of gold and the annual gold increments, quite insufficient to prevent an injurious fall in the prices of property.

In watching the test which is coming in the future, of the predictions of the bimetalists, the people of the United States, which is a debtor nation toward other countries, need not comfort themselves with the belief that they can endure the effect of the continuous and unrelenting movement toward the single gold standard as safely as can the Empire of England, which is a creditor nation toward other countries.

THE HELPFULNESS OF THE BALANCE OF TRADE.

It is true that the rise in the price of wheat has made the Western farmer temporarily prosperous. Our enormous exports of food products have been of immense advantage to the whole country, and the balances of trade in our favor during most of the time since the demonetization of silver began have warded off from us a large part of the progressing evils of the single gold standard.

Our excess of exports of merchandise since 1890 have been as follows (9 years and 10 months):

	Imports.	Exports.
1890, excess of imports.....	$2,730,277
1890, excess of exports.....		$83,518,275
1891, excess of exports.....		89,564,614
1892, excess of exports.....		202,875,886
1893, excess of imports.....	18,738,728
1894, excess of exports.....		287,145,690

	Imports.	Exports.
1895, excess of exports.....		$75,568,800
1896, excess of exports.....		102,882,284
1897, excess of exports.....		236,263,144
1898, excess of exports (10 months).....		514,245,495
Total.....	$21,468,005	1,537,063,628
Deduct excess of imports from excess of exports.....		21,468,005
Balance in our favor of merchandise trade.....		1,505,595,623
Between 1889 and 1897 (8 years) we had—
Excess of exports over imports of gold.....		323,628,544
Excess of exports over imports of silver.....		182,828,930
There should also be added for—
1897, excess of exports over imports of silver.....		31,413,411
1898, excess of exports over imports of silver (10 months).....		36,729,532
Making a total of.....		2,000,193,060
In 1897 we began to receive gold again, imports over exports.....	44,653,200
1898 (10 months), imports over exports.....	86,479,498
Making a total for deduction of excess for 1 year and 10 months of gold imports over exports of.....		129,132,698
Total balance in our favor, merchandise and gold and silver, since 1889 (9 years and 10 months).....		1,901,060,362

These are suggestive figures. How have we been benefited by the net balance in our favor of nearly two thousand millions in ten years, if it has brought to us only one hundred and twenty-nine millions of gold? If American travelers in Europe have spent there one hundred millions a year, one thousand millions are accounted for. If we have paid to other countries fifty millions a year for bringing our imports, which does not appear in the statistical tables, five hundred millions more are accounted for, and the other five hundred millions we may have been paid by sending home to us our bonds owned abroad. We have indeed been a fortunate country. But we can not always count upon such enormous balances of trade in our favor. By reason of them we have been able to stand the pressure of the gold standard; if it had not been for them, the business of the country would have been placed in a dire extremity and the people would have burst the bonds of the gold standard as quickly as Samson broke the green withes that bound him.

Consider what would have been our situation if our exports for the last two years had been less than our imports. It would have been impossible to prevent a financial panic or to keep gold from going to a premium, with the progress of silver demonetization still going forward. We ought, therefore, to avail ourselves of the present fortunate moment and guard against future evils by enlarging the metallic basis of our own and the world's money and placing our monetary system upon safe and sure foundations; those of bimetalism, with its eight thousand millions of coined real money and twelve thousand millions of gold and silver bullion, instead of the narrow basis consisting of only the insufficient gold of the world.

EUROPEAN WARS COULD NOT BE CONDUCTED ON THE GOLD STANDARD.

Nor should the nations of Europe believe that their financial systems can safely rest longer upon the basis of the single gold standard. If the peace of Europe continues, that standard may exist some years longer, but with the first outbreak of a European war gold will go to a premium, and there will then be two methods for the nations which are in arms—one, the issue of paper money, which will go below par in gold; the other, the remonetization of silver. With such remonetization seasonably resorted to by the continental powers and by the United States, the parity between the two metals could be sustained all over the world even in case of extensive wars, and utter financial demoralization could be averted. Remonetization before a war in Europe, instead of unlimited issues of paper money by nations in arms, would be the wisest action.

BIMETALLISM IS THE PEOPLE'S CAUSE.

Coming again nearer home: Gold monometallism being a device of the rich to make themselves richer to the oppression of the other classes in society, should be resisted with zeal and energy by the Republican party, which professes to desire the prosperity and welfare of the whole people. The tendency of the times to yield to the demands of aggregated wealth in its various forms should be opposed by the great Republican leaders whom I see before me. What is driving away votes from the party? Nothing except the conviction growing in many minds that its powers and its organization are passing into the control of the money power, so called; and that we rely for success not upon the advocacy of popular measures and the free and deliberate preferences of the voters, but upon the influences and agencies of combined and consolidated riches and upon the corrupt use of money to carry nominations and elections.

DUTY OF REPUBLICAN PARTY TO BIMETALLISM.

This may not be a just belief. It will be the part of wisdom to eradicate its growth and destroy its effect by proclaiming purposes beneficial and popular and by renewed appeals to the best sentiments and deepest convictions of the voters who have so generously sustained the party during its honorable existence for forty-two years. The most appropriate and gratifying specific thing we can do is to plant ourselves firmly upon the declaration of President McKinley on February 12, 1891, when he said he was against all efforts to "demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the value of money among the people, make money scarce and therefore dear," "increase the value of money and diminish the value of everything else—money the master, everything else its servant"—and to assert the unyielding opposition of the United States to the permanent adoption of the single gold standard of money and the determination to persist in the efforts to secure the restoration of silver to the coinage in this country, and, if possible, throughout the world. We ought to do this, not only in the interest of a great and noble political party, but also in a much larger than party interest—for the protection and benefit of the great masses of mankind.

APPENDIX.
THE INDIAN CURRENCY.

The Editor of the Times.

SIR: It is a hard saying to some that a gold standard is impossible for India. The subject has been discussed as if the choice of a money standard were within the unlimited discretion of a Government, and as if the only question were the method of acquiring the standard selected. This is not a scientific view. Governments would certainly act wisely at all times in having regard to the economic conditions of their subjects, and their tastes and habits in the matter of currency. To force something unnatural, and especially to attempt a change when a community has already got a money which admirably serves the purposes for which money is required, is always injudicious and injurious. But such a change may be impossible as well, and this is a point not to be overlooked in the matter of a gold standard for India. Is a gold standard for India really possible or not? In a discussion from this point of view, I am in full agreement, I believe, with the best city opinion, which encourages me to take up the subject.

We may throw aside at the beginning all idea of establishing a gold standard without a gold money, or without a currency immediately and readily convertible into gold, which implies the existence of gold reserves. All such fancy schemes are essentially bad. They are to be rejected, among other grounds, on the score of the injury they inflict by causing discredit. This has been exemplified in the case of India during the last few years. Capital, we are told on all sides, has been brought home from India at the high exchange ruling, and new capital will not go out because no one knows what the money of India will be. This is the penalty the government and the people of India pay for an artificial and managed system of money. The same discredit must continue until there is again an automatic standard money with which the Government does not meddle.

Assuming, then, that a gold standard with a gold money is the object to be aimed at in India, if it is to have a gold standard at all, what are the difficulties in the way?

The general difficulty is that India is both a poor and heavily indebted country, having large remittances to make annually in payment of interest and dividends to foreign creditor countries, and chiefly to England, with a gold standard. Such a country, if it has the same money as the creditor country, can only retain it with difficulty. By the necessity of the case the exchange is chronically against it. People in India and the government itself with money to remit seek bills on England, on which accordingly there is a premium. What the nature of this premium is is very well explained in Mr. Bagehot's papers on the silver question. The result of such a premium in a debtor country having a gold money the same as its creditor country is that the gold tends to go away. It is the most ready asset to send, far preferable to goods. In other words, then, there is likely to be a steady drain of currency from a debtor country like India if its currency is the same as the creditor country, England, and this steady drain will contract and disturb the money market till the situation becomes intolerable.

This is the general rationale of the statement so often made in the city that some countries are too poor to have a gold standard. It is not poverty merely that makes the difficulty, but poverty combined with heavy indebtedness. The gold money in such a case steadily tends to go away. The remaining currency, whether of paper or other coin, is then with difficulty convertible into gold, and so the standard is lost.

In this view, it is a great convenience to a debtor country like India, and, in fact, almost a necessity, to have a money different from that of its creditor countries. When the money is different, the depression of exchange in the debtor country, which is the result of the competition for bills on the creditor country, lowers the valuation of the money compared with the creditor's money, and thereby the value of all goods in the debtor country compared with the creditor's money. Hence, there is a stimulus to the export of those goods which are suitable for the creditor country, and the money of the debtor country is not acted upon at all, although it is one of the first things to be acted on, as we have seen, when the debtor country has the same money as its creditor. Hence, the debtor country, with a different money from that of the creditor country is able to retain that money in spite of its poverty and the adverse exchange, and the mischief of a contracted money market due to normal exchange operations is spared it.

There are many cases in point of countries in an economic position resembling that of India, but perhaps not so poor, which have attempted a gold standard, but have failed. A conspicuous case in my own recollection is that of Italy, which issued a gold loan about fifteen years ago and obtained £10,000,000 in order to introduce a gold standard, but failed of success. The gold standard was never really effective, or was so for so short a period as hardly to be noticeable, and the standard is long since gone. The Argentine Republic, again, has twice failed; Brazil and Chile have failed; Spain has failed; Austria and Russia failed to keep a metallic standard of silver for similar reasons. Some of the countries named are once more renewing the attempt at a gold standard, and Japan is a new beginner in the same line; but, unless one or more of them prove to be unexpectedly rich—and Japan, for instance, is rich for the moment—the attempt is no more than an experiment, and we are justified in saying it is far from certain to succeed. As I write, Japan is said to be proposing a new loan of £15,000,000 to relieve the depression! There is nothing, then, to weaken the force of the lesson which all these failures teach us. A gold standard is not an easy thing for a poor and indebted country with its creditors also possessing that standard. The chances are that even very costly attempts will not succeed.

It must surely be a matter of obvious precaution when the Indian government attempts a gold standard to look well beforehand, to make sure that what it proposes is a thing that can really be done.

I have been dealing with the question up to this point on general principles. The conclusion is strengthened when the cost of any real attempt is fully weighed and considered. The Indian government can not bear the expense.

There is much discussion in the papers in detail as to the amount of gold required to give India a gold money; but having regard to the three main requirements—the active circulation, the reserve against government notes, and an extraordinary reserve against contingencies—we may say that very large sums will be needed "to make sure." A sum of £50,000,000 should at least be accumulated beforehand. But to name a sum of £50,000,000, or anything like that sum, as the reserve of gold to be accumulated beforehand in India is to show the practical impossibility of the operation at the present time. India is not rich enough at present, though it might become rich enough in happier circumstances. Time would also be required for the operation, and time is altogether wanting as things now stand.

The truth is that the Indian government does not face the problem of adopting a gold standard. It tries to do the business on the cheap by creating, at an enormous cost to the mercantile community of India, an artificial scarcity of currency so as to force the community to accept gold; but that is a still more costly method in reality, as the process may ruin the country.

I submit, then, that what is really in question is not, as the Indian government supposes, a question of the best method of establishing a gold standard in India, but whether the establishment of such a standard is practicable at all, or practicable at any cost which India can afford. If this is impossible, then the only alternative clearly is to return to silver money. No greater evil than an artificial and managed currency can be inflicted on a country. It is not unreasonable, therefore, to say that sooner or later the error committed in 1893 may have to be acknowledged and reversed.

The highest political issues are also involved. One of the most dangerous things for a government to do is to tamper with the people's money. Is it quite certain that the Indian government can go on long with its present ideas regarding money and monetary standards without producing the gravest complications in the government of India itself?

I am, etc.,

ROBERT GIFFEN.

MAY.

The Editor of the Times.

SIR: I ask permission to add a few words to what has been well said by Sir R. Giffen.

I leave for the moment the Indian aspect of the scheme proposed by the Indian government and the "money murder" involved in it, and the strange indifference shown by Government to the interests of the multitude of holders of silver in India and to the agonies of the money markets there.

I desire to call attention to the importance of the scheme to all English investors. The proposal involves handing over the control of about two-thirds of our gold reserve at the bank to a body of officials in Calcutta, and to this I object most strongly. At first they ask for £5,000,000, but they ask for power to draw £15,000,000 more when required, to say nothing of even further demands.

The export of £5,000,000 at this moment might have very serious consequences. It seems to be forgotten that the purchase of the wheat which we require this year may cost us from £20,000,000 to £30,000,000 more than the same import would have cost two years ago. Thus, whether we will or not, we are face to face with an enormous additional claim on our resources, and one which will give increased power over our gold to our cousins across the Atlantic, whose needs may be greatly enhanced by the war on which they have entered. Moreover, the tendency to higher prices is not confined to corn, and business at home makes greater demands on our resources. On every side there are political complications and uncertainties, and our relations with nations all over the world are so intimate that special demands may arise at almost any moment. As I write Japan holds a very large deposit at the bank, which helps to swell the figures of the last return, and any day she may require money and may take it in gold. I mention this merely as an illustration, which shows how necessary it is to retain our hold on our gold and not to give power over it to others.

Already 4 per cent has depressed the values of the best securities, and this fall must continue if we are to have a permanent advance in the bank rate and in the charge made for loans on the stock exchange. It seems to me, therefore, that every holder of securities is interested in avoiding any engagement which must seriously affect our gold reserve not in the regular course of business, but as a certain consequence of a mere experiment, the results of which are extremely uncertain, and are, in the opinion of many experts, more likely to injure than to help the people of India.

Taking the whole situation into view, I am confident that the greatest care is required in order to avoid alarm and panic in our own country. The action of the Government of India in 1893 has caused something like a panic there, and it behooves us to take care that we are not led away by official theories into the adoption of any scheme which may result in repeating in the center of the Empire a disturbance which has caused so serious trouble in Calcutta and Bombay.

I remain yours, faithfully,

WILLIAM FOWLER.

43 GROSVENOR SQUARE, May 14.

P. S.—I wish to note that I have considered only the demands involved in the scheme proposed by the government of India, and have avoided any reference to the opinions expressed by some authorities as to the gold reserve required to be in the hands of the Indian government in order to create an effective gold standard in India. For example, Mr. H. D. McLeod talks of £100,000,000, and Mr. David Yule of £77,000,000, not to mention very large estimates made by Mr. Gibbs and others.

The Editor of the Times.

SIR: May I beg a small space to tender to Sir R. Giffen, on behalf of Ceylon and the great tea industry, on which her prosperity has been rebuilt, our warm thanks for his outspoken letter on the Indian currency, published by you to-day?

In the feeble efforts that we have been able to make in defense of our interests we have been roughly hustled out of court as lunatics and talkers of absurd nonsense. Our request for a chosen representative on the committee of inquiry into matters vital to our future welfare has been rejected.

It would be difficult to find words adequate to express the sense of relief with which Sir R. Giffen's letter will be read by all Ceylon men, both here and in the colony.

Yours, faithfully,

WM. MARTIN LEAKE,

Secretary.

THE CEYLON ASSOCIATION IN LONDON,

61-63 Gracechurch street, May 15.

MR. HOAR. Mr. President, I had no purpose of addressing the Senate upon the pending bill unless it should happen when the time for voting approached late in the week some amendments might require a brief discussion, perhaps under the five or ten minute rule.

I am in general accord, as I suppose is well known, with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] in his desire for the establishment of international bimetalism, in his disappointment that the mission authorized by Congress last year failed of immediate and successful accomplishment, and in his regret for some of the utterances of the very worthy gentleman who holds the important office of Secretary of the Treasury.

I have been inclined, in the light of his subsequent explanations, to suppose that those utterances were rather the result of a want of familiarity with public affairs, though if it was want of familiarity with such affairs, he was a man of large business experience and capacity, and that the Secretary of the Treasury did not intend to discourage or to hinder the honest and zealous attempt of the President for an establishment of international bimetalism and the reinstatement of silver in this country, but rather was speaking of an opinion that the gold standard should be maintained for the present and under existing circumstances until that was done, a desire which I suppose he shares with the Senator from New Hampshire himself.

But in regard to that I have no special duty and with it I have no special concern. Whether the Secretary of the Treasury be in accord with the President, whether he be in accord with the Republican party, whether he be in accord with my own judgment of what is right, does not much affect our duty with reference to providing the sinews for this war.

But the Senator from New Hampshire, I have no doubt misled, and honestly misled, without any malignant or unkind purpose, has seen fit to revive in my presence what is an infamous and vile slander, or was when it originated, not only upon President Grant and the Republican party, but upon an eminent citizen of Massachusetts now gone to his grave, whose reputation I should be bound to defend if I had no personal connection with it, but whose reputation in fact is as dear to me as my own, and is dearer to me than the little that remains to me of my life.

Now, Mr. President, saying again that I suppose that honorable Senator has been misled, I declare under my responsibility as a Senator and as a gentleman that the charge that the Supreme Court of the United States was packed for the purpose of reversing the legal-tender decision, or that an effect upon the legal-tender decision came into the consideration either of President Grant or his advisers, is as vile a slander as ever thrust up its dirty head from the stump.

Mr. President, what are the facts, and what is the evidence upon which is based this charge, dishonorable alike to a great soldier and a great President and a great branch of this Government? Prior to the year 1869 there had been a statute enacted that the number of the judges of the Supreme Court should be reduced to seven; that is, that there should be no new judges appointed in case of vacancies until the number should be reduced from nine or ten to seven. That was found to work badly in practice. We had several aged men upon the court—Taney, Grier, and Nelson—far past the time of the Psalmist's three score and ten. In 1869, in the beginning of General Grant's Administration, at the request of members of the court, without distinction of party, it was enacted that in the following December there should be another judge appointed, making the number nine again, which had then been reduced to eight.

At that time I suppose there was no more thought or dream in the mind of any human being of the legal-tender decision than there was of the present war with Spain. In the course of the summer one of the judges, Mr. Justice Grier, sent in his resignation to take effect the following February, I think. When Congress assembled in December, President Grant tendered the appointments, one to Mr. Secretary Stanton and the other to Mr. Hoar, the Attorney-General. Mr. Stanton took the oath of office, and died before taking his seat upon the bench. Mr. Hoar was rejected by the Senate, with whom he had got into a very bitter controversy in regard to the appointment of the judges of the new circuit courts, whom he determined should be appointed on their merits and should not be treated as a matter of public and political patronage.

In regard to that matter I have nothing to say; but it occurred to no human being, I suppose, that either of those two gentlemen was selected with any reference to the legal-tender decision. Mr. Strong had been invited to take the place of the Attorney-General of the United States as the successor of Mr. Hoar, and he came to Washington at the invitation of the President to see about it. Stanton dying and Judge Hoar being rejected, the President selected Mr. Strong and Mr. Bradley, and on the 7th day of February, a few minutes after 12 o'clock, the names of those two gentlemen were upon the table of the Senate, two hours before the decision in the legal-tender case of Hepburn vs. Griswold was announced.

Mr. President, does anybody in this country, looking back on the illustrious career of those two great jurists, doubt for a moment that their selection was warranted upon the merits? President Grant had tried to get a Republican judge from the Southern States who would be acceptable to the profession, and had failed on inquiry, as he had himself declared. The court was then composed, one from New England, one from New York, one from California, two, I think, from Ohio, and one other from the West.

Mr. DAVIS. One from Iowa.

Mr. HOAR. One from Iowa and one from the far West; and the great space, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and the great central States, known as the Middle States, were without a representative. What was more natural than that the leader of the bar of the State of New Jersey and the leader of the bar of the State of Pennsylvania, both being Republicans, should be selected to that important place? In addition to the other reasons for the appointment of Mr. Justice Bradley there was an earnest and zealous letter commending him to the President for his succession by Mr. Justice Grier, the great Democratic judge who concurred in the legal-tender decision.

Now, Mr. President, one other suggestion. Where was President Grant to find a judge in the Republican party who was not of that way of thinking? There were then known to the country and, so far as I can ascertain from a pretty careful inquiry into the subject, there are now known to the country but two persons of any eminence in the Republican party who questioned the constitutionality of the legal-tender law. It had been sustained by every State court in the North that had had the question before it, and by every court that had had the question before it except the court of the State of Kentucky, and there the very able chancellor dissented from the opinion of the court.

Mr. Cox, of Ohio, a member of the Cabinet, thought the majority decision, as he says in a letter, was the better law, and Mr. Cox undoubtedly is a man who would have graced and adorned that court, but there were two judges, the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Swayne, from Ohio then upon the bench. The other exception is my dear and honored and beloved friend and instructor, Judge Thomas, but he was only half a Republican. He had joined the party during the war. He had been opposed to nearly all of its policies, and I do not suppose he voted a Republican ticket from 1868, a time preceding the legal-tender decision, until the day of his death.

Why do you assign this infamous, vile, contemptible, and discreditable motive—a motive impossible under the circumstances—for a very simple and natural action? Can anybody for a moment claim that if the legal-tender decision of Hepburn and Griswold never had been heard of President Grant would not have appointed two Republican judges to those vacancies, the additional vacancy, as I said, having been provided for by a law passed early in the year 1869, and that he would not have gone to the leaders of the bar of these two great States unrepresented there for his judges and would not have selected these two gentlemen, who were among the brightest and most shining lights in our whole judicial history?

Mr. President, I said that these nominations were upon the table of the Senate before the decision of Hepburn and Griswold. I am aware that in conference in November, 1869, two or three months before, the court, as is usual in such cases, had come to a decision by a bare majority in favor of the doctrine as announced by Chief Justice Chase from the bench. But admitting that to be true, you have got to make out this charge to establish two propositions: First, that President Grant had ever heard of it, and next, that if he had heard of it he would not have appointed just the same men whom he did appoint and no others; and both those propositions are impossible of being sustained.

The court always, some time before the final decision is prepared, has its consultation, but there has been but one single instance in our history where the decision of the Supreme Court in chambers has leaked out before it was announced from the bench, and that was a case which created a good deal of public indignation and comment at the time.

Now, Mr. President, there is not the slightest pretense or scintilla of evidence that President Grant, or that anybody who was his adviser, had ever heard of the decision of Hepburn and Griswold, not announced publicly until after these gentlemen were selected. Not only is there no evidence, but President Grant, Hamilton Fish, and Attorney-General Hoar, all three have declared in public letters that they never heard of the decision, and that the selection of the justices had nothing whatever to do with the decision.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood the Senator to say that the nomination of those judges was here before the decision was announced.

Mr. HOAR. I say so.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator may be right.

Mr. HOAR. I am right.

Mr. CHANDLER. I take no issue with the Senator on anything. The Senator is not taking any issue with me that I know of. I find this statement in the footnote in the Legal-Tender Cases, 12 Wallace, page 528:

The judgment in Hepburn vs. Griswold was announced from the bench and entered February 7, 1870.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The note proceeds:

Mr. Justice Strong was appointed February 18, 1870, and Mr. Justice Bradley March 21, 1870.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood the Senator to say that those names were before the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly. Appointment does not come until after confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. But does the Senator mean to say that the names of those judges had been here all that time?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; they had been here all that time. I have had the whole record searched.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator may be right about it. At first blush the Senator would seem to be mistaken.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think there is any occasion for anybody to blush. There is not for me. There is not any first blush about it. Let me repeat. Mr. President, the nominations of Judge Strong and Judge Bradley—I have a copy of the record of the Senate before me—were both upon the table of the Senate on the 7th of February, 1870. The Senate on that day met; some petitions were presented, a few, and the Senate immediately proceeded to consider the funeral resolutions in honor of a deceased Senator and adjourned. The moment the Journal was read the President's secretary came in and announced a certain message.

It was the only time he came in that day, and it was within five minutes or ten minutes after 12 o'clock, as soon as the Journal had been read. The Senate did not go into executive session that day, but the next day when it did go in the executive messages were read to the Senate announcing Mr. Justice Strong's and Mr. Justice Bradley's nominations. Those nominations are in the Evening Star of that afternoon, and in several of the New York and several of the Western papers of that afternoon, February 7.

Now, the opinion read the same day was given by the Chief Justice after the court had met. The court heard motions and the judges gave in succession their opinions, and the Chief Justice gave his opinion, probably not reaching it until two hours after the court met, also at 12 o'clock. So that for two hours or thereabouts these nominations had been on the table of the Senate before the decision was announced.

But that is not all. We are not led to the discussion of a few minutes in a day. The President had submitted those nominations to his Cabinet the week before. Judge Strong's nomination had been announced as one agreed upon more than a week before, and Judge Bradley had been spoken of in the press as a probable appointee. It is true, as the Senator says, that the appointments did not take place for two or three weeks afterwards; but what of that? The point is whether those two judges were selected by Ulysses S. Grant and his Attorney-General with a view of packing the Supreme Court of the United States to overrule a judgment of the court. Ulysses S. Grant had determined on those names for days before the decision was announced. He had submitted them to his Cabinet at the last preceding Cabinet meeting, which, I think, was on Thursday of the week before he had sent them to the Senate, and they had been on the table here for two hours.

The point which has misled my honorable friend—I see how he was misled by not reflecting that it was necessary that the appointments should not be made until after the Senate had consented and the President had been notified—the point is of the motive in the mind of Ulysses S. Grant and in the minds of the persons who were responsible for advising him in choosing these two illustrious and famous jurists.

I say, therefore, that in order to have this thing possible—I do not speak now about the proof; I do not speak now about the weight of evidence—in order to have this thing possible, we have got to suppose that the councils of the court as to its decision in the previous November or December had leaked out. In regard to that I have had the whole press of the country searched, and there is not an assertion in a single newspaper, North or South, East or West, affirming that the court had come to any such conclusion. It had not reached the public; it had not reached the press; it had not reached the Senate; it had not reached the Republican party, and there has not been any suggestion from any member of the court that any other member of the court or anybody else had betrayed its councils.

There has been, as I said just now, only one such case in our history, and that was a case which took place some twenty or twenty-five years ago, where the value of some great corporate property was concerned, and nobody ever knew how the decision got out. I could tell my honorable friend from New Hampshire in private a rather amusing story as to what occurred between two of the judges on that subject which it is not worth while to state here.

It was intimated in the political anger of the time that when President Buchanan announced that he was willing to leave the subject of dealing with the question of slavery in the Territories to the Supreme Court, he had some intimation in advance of the Dred Scott decision, but that was denied by the friends of the court and the friends of the President as a foul and calumnious slander, and undoubtedly professional men of all parties are agreed that President Buchanan's confidence grew out of his general knowledge of the opinions of the great men who composed the bench at that time, not that he had any particular political understanding with any of them.

Mr. President, against this bare possibility of things happening in this one case that have not happened except in one other for a hundred years, you have got the deliberate assertion and affirmation of Ulysses S. Grant and Hamilton Fish and Judge Hoar, who, each of them, affirm—Mr. Fish in a published letter, in which he said that he made the statement by the authority of the President, and Judge Hoar in a speech in the House of Representatives, in a published letter to one of the New York papers, and in several public speeches at home—that they never had heard of this decision, and that the appointment of these gentlemen was made because they were, under the circumstances, the fittest and most proper persons to be appointed, without any other motive or consideration whatever.

Mr. President, I do not think that anybody is likely to be found in this country now who is willing to stand up and charge Ulysses S. Grant or Hamilton Fish with lying. If there be, I shall have some curiosity to see the statement.

In regard to Judge Hoar, who was the Attorney-General, perhaps it may not be in bad taste for me to say, under the circumstances, that having passed through a good many heated and angry political and other controversies in his lifetime, there never came to my ears from my earliest youth a suggestion or suspicion, coming from friend or foe, political supporter or political opponent, against his absolute integrity.

I have heard people talk about his temper, as I have heard people talk about my own, and I have heard people talk about his being wanting in respect for some political magnates, but it never yet has come to my knowledge from any quarter that anybody supposed that the thing which was in his heart he failed to utter with his lips from any respect of personal consequence to himself, or that the things he thought he ought to do he ever shrunk or flinched from avowing.

I know, Mr. President, that President Grant, and not the Attorney-General, had the appointing power, but you can not in the least shield the memory of his Attorney-General by any suggestion of that kind. He, on the fullest inquiry, selected these men and recommended them to the President of the United States for appointment, and he must take the honor or the infamy that belongs to it. You do not in the least shield the memory of Stratford or of Laud by saying that Charles I. and not the ministry, was responsible for the conduct of the Crown.

In addition to the three affirmations I have cited, you have two others, almost equally emphatic and pregnant. Mr. Boutwell, in a letter which I have here before me, says that he was a member of the Cabinet, that the names of these gentlemen were placed before the Cabinet (he was the Secretary of the Treasury), and that the question of their opinions upon the legal-tender matter never was brought up or thought of for a moment so far as he was aware; that the choice was made because of their eminent fitness and because of the localities to which they belonged, and in which they were the most eminent and illustrious members of the profession.

Mr. Cox goes even a little further than that. He is in favor of the legal-tender decision; he thinks it is or the whole better law; which I do not. Mr. Cox says there never was an occasion where two officers were selected more absolutely upon their merits than these two.

Mr. President, I wish to say one thing especially with reference to the memory of Mr. Justice Bradley. Is it likely that he was a man to be chosen to do the bidding on the bench of a corrupt Executive and a corrupt party? Why, Mr. President, the one thing to which the Republican party was committed, the one great foundation stone of its policy after the war, known as the reconstruction policy, was in its opinion as to the effect and extent of the fourteenth amendment and of the extent of the powers of Congress under that amendment to deal with the suffrage and race conditions in the Southern States.

The Republican party in both Houses of Congress said that the Constitution, when it said if any State denied to any class of its citizens the equal protection of the laws on account of race, color, or previous condition, meant that Congress shall have jurisdiction and legislative power over the subject, and the question was whether the failure to secure it by the States, whether the practical denial in choosing juries and choosing election officers and administering election laws by the officers of a State was a denial by the State, so that Congress could interfere, or whether the denial must be by the express legislative or executive or judicial power of the State itself; and it was due to Mr. Justice Bradley that the great reconstruction policies of the party which summoned him to the bench were overthrown, and these questions were left, as they have been left, to the Democratic States of the South, in the hands of the Democratic whites, without any considerable or effective interference from the national power—a political question as compared with which this question of the legal tenders shrinks into insignificance. It was to that great and illustrious jurist, whose decisions command the homage and submission of all his countrymen, that the Democratic party has owed the vindication of its own position as to that great question.

Mr. President, I might expand this discussion indefinitely. I do not suppose for a moment that when the Senator from New Hampshire made this statement he did anything more than take up, without any very considerable investigation, a charge which has gone the rounds of the press and been believed by many good and respectable persons because of a want of contradiction. Still less do I suppose that it was the purpose of the kindly gentleman from New Hampshire (although he called my name when he introduced what he had to say) to wound or strike at me by striking at a person so dear to me; but I thought it was my duty to myself, my duty to the Commonwealth which I represent, my duty to a beloved and honored memory, my duty to the court, my duty to the Constitution of my country—whose leading, principal, and most illustrious feature is the provision which it has made for that tribunal, which shall stand above the heats and passions and conflicts of party or of section, to administer law in that serene and quiet chamber where its judges sit—to say what I have said.

Mr. President, it is no slight thing to make an attack on the Supreme Court of the United States. I have been sorry when I have heard or read expressions, of threats, attacks, denunciations of the decisions of that great tribunal. There have been but fifteen cases, I think, in all, when you come to examine them carefully, in which the Supreme Court of the United States has held acts of Congress unconstitutional. Nearly all of them, or all of any considerable importance, have been since the war. With those few exceptions the people have governed themselves through their appointed and constituted representatives and the appointed and constitutional representatives of the States in this and the other Congressional chamber in freedom and in honor without restraint.

While I was absent I read that some Senator—I am not quite sure who—had spoken very harshly of the decision of the Supreme Court on the income tax and had declared that the result of a similar decision would be the overthrow of the court itself.

I wonder if my Democratic brethren on this floor, especially the statesmen who represent the South, have ever reflected that during this long period of one hundred and ten years that court has in every instance, with that single exception, in holding a statute of the United States unconstitutional, acted in accordance with the present opinions of the Democratic party and the present opinions of the Southern people? There are some exceptions to it, like Marbury vs. Madison, where the court held that Congress could not confer a new and original jurisdiction to issue a writ of mandamus, or something of that kind, upon the court; but in the main the great questions, with a single exception, the income tax, which have divided sections, which have divided parties, which have made angry differences in this or the other House of Congress—the decisions of the Supreme Court have been in accordance with the doctrines which you now hold and the interests which you now represent.

Is it not worth while, when a single matter of this kind has been decided in opposition to your views, your desires, and your opinions, to ask, has it not on the whole been better for the South, has it not on the whole been better for the Democratic party, has it not on the whole been better for pure Democracy, has it not on the whole been better for the States and the people who were on the losing side in our great controversy, that you have had this court in that chamber to superintend the action of Congress that might check the excited and angry power of an angry majority?

Why, Mr. President, I shall not undertake to debate the income tax; I arose for quite a different purpose; but as I have said a word about it, I should like to ask gentlemen who are so impatient and indignant at that decision, if they will read the history of the times and if they do not find in that history the clearest proof that if it had been supposed that Congress could impose an income tax upon the people of the United States without regard to the population of the States, there would not have been one single State that would have voted to accept the Constitution.

Do they not find there—I am not saying now that they were not wholly right and the court wholly wrong—but do they not find there ample evidence that the fathers said, "Here are to be two great divisions of taxation—taxation for State powers and taxation for the raising of money for national powers;" and they said—they had, as you know, but thirteen States in those days, and they did not expect any more except out of the existing territory—they said, "We will take for the nation the duties on imports; we will take excises, if they be necessary; we will take the sales of the public lands"—which it was declared in the Constitutional Convention itself would probably pay all the expenses of the National Government for centuries to come—"and you, the States, may take taxes." If there comes some great emergency where the nation needs direct taxes, then taxation and representation, taxation and power, the purse that provides and the vote that orders, shall go together, attesting to our ancient doctrine of freedom.

Is it not possible that when Adam Smith said, just before that, that a direct tax was a tax which the person who paid it paid finally, and that an indirect tax was a tax on something that he passed over to somebody else, and when Bouvier's Law Dictionary makes that same definition to-day—I am not saying they were right—but is it not just barely possible that an honest judge might have thought so in the face of that history and in the face of those distinctions?

Mr. President, if it be possible that honest judges thought so, is it worth while—for nothing can stand in this country that has not the respect and approbation of the people—is it worth while for the leaders of the people to attempt to destroy the confidence of those who listen to their words in this great tribunal, which is the pride and the glory and the peculiar characteristic of our popular Government, wherein it differs from all the rest that ever have existed or that are likely to exist, merely because you are disappointed in a single case and differ from the court in a single decision?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, when the Senator from Massachusetts glances at my remarks in the RECORD to-morrow, if he does me that honor, I do not think he will find that there is any material issue between him and myself. I certainly do not think I have cast any aspersion upon anyone. Certainly I do not think I have revived any slander against anyone, certainly not against General Grant, nor could I have intended to do anything of the kind in reference to that distinguished son of Massachusetts, Judge Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar, whose career I witnessed and admired, who was a great lawyer and a very able Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. President, in what I have said, if carefully examined, it will be seen, in connection with the decision affirming the constitutionality of the legal tenders, that I have condemned no one. I neither criticised nor aspersed the motives of any person connected with those decisions, either the first decision of that court as to the constitutionality of those legal tenders or the two subsequent decisions affirming the constitutionality of the legal tenders.

The only statement I have made which might be criticised is the one which I submit again, and that is the statement that the Republican party as a political movement pursued the subject of the legal tenders until by Republican judges they were affirmed to be constitutional. The Republican party was sensitive upon that subject, as I think the Senator from Massachusetts suggested parties are sometimes sensitive upon great legal questions of this kind.

The legal tenders had been issued as a war measure by Mr. Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury, and when he afterwards, upon the bench of the Supreme Court, turned the scale against the legal tenders, and himself delivered the opinion that the legal-tender act was unconstitutional, the Republican party, as a party, took an interest in the reversal of that decision.

Mr. President, I attribute and I trust no one attributes improper motives to the President of the United States who made the appointments of the judges which followed that controversy or to the Attorneys-General who advised those appointments, but the Republican party through appropriate avenues pursued the subject until, first in 1872, it secured a majority opinion of the Supreme Court that the legal-tender act was constitutional. Ten years passed by. Every vacancy upon the bench was filled by Republicans, until there was but one Democrat there and eight Republicans; and then the question was brought before the Supreme Court again, and a decision, 8 to 1, secured in favor of the constitutionality of the legal tenders. In that whole proceeding from beginning to end I sympathized with the determination to secure a decision for what I regarded as the right side of the question.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. With pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator if he knows of a Republican in the United States whom it would have been fit and proper to appoint to that court at the time any of these gentlemen were appointed who was not of that way of thinking? I do not know one.

Mr. CHANDLER. Presumably not. I do not think a Republican jurist of eminence could have been found who would not have affirmed the constitutionality of the legal tenders, and yet there is to be observed the remarkable fact that the great statesman of America, Mr. Chief Justice Chase, who had issued the legal tenders, did decide them to be unconstitutional, and there was great feeling in the Republican party on that subject. As I said in my previous remarks, he did not reach that opinion until after he had changed his politics, so that the presumption was all in favor of the result of the appointment of Republican judges, that whenever the question as to the constitutionality of the legal tenders should be again brought before the Supreme Court, their constitutionality would be affirmed.

I know of no motive on the part of any human being in connection with the whole subject which I would condemn. I only introduced the history as it stands, and as I have narrated it, in order to argue that if it was necessary thus zealously to guard the right of the Government in time of peace, as well as in time of war, to issue paper money and make it legal-tender currency, it is also important to guard zealously and carefully the right of the Government to make the metallic money of the country, gold and silver, the money of the Constitution; in other words, provide for coining money and regulating the value thereof as the Constitution directs.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, there appears to be a great deal of misapprehension as to the conditions, surroundings, and environment of the legal-tender case at the time Justices Bradley and Strong were appointed. The Democratic party in Congress and the Democratic bar throughout the country had taken grounds against the constitutionality of the legal-tender provision in the greenbacks in time of peace. That was the general position of the Democratic party. The case of Hepburn was appealed to the appellate court of the State of Kentucky, and it was decided by that appellate court that the Government had no power to make legal-tender paper money in time of peace. The case was before the Supreme Court from a judgment denying the constitutionality of the legal-tender provision of the greenbacks.

I desire that my friend the Senator from Massachusetts shall understand these facts. There were eight judges on the bench. Four of them were Democrats. It was understood by the public that the Democrats would vote to affirm the judgment of the Kentucky court and would hold that Congress did not have the power to create legal-tender paper money in time of peace. Mr. Chief Justice Chase had been a Republican, but he was then affiliating with the Democratic party and his position was doubtful. But it did not make any difference how he decided. If they divided 4 to 4 it would affirm the decision, and it was well known when the case was taken to the Supreme Court how it would be decided, if anything could possibly be known which had not already occurred. It was discussed and spoken of as a case decided before it was argued. Everybody understood how it would be, and it created a good deal of excitement here.

The only question was whether Judge Chase would change his views and go with the Democrats; whether he would adhere to his action as Secretary of the Treasury and assume that the Government had the power to create legal-tender money, or join the Democrats. But whatever he did would make no difference in the decision. The decision would be affirmed. It was constantly discussed how the case would be affected by the new judges. Everybody knew what the inevitable result of putting two Republicans on the bench would be. When it was suggested that it was packing the court, we said, "Very well; that is what we propose to do, if we can, to save this country. We propose to pack it. It has always been packed by the party in power. We packed the court against the Dred Scott decision."

Call it packing or what you please, every member appointed by Mr. Lincoln was known to be against the doctrine of the Dred Scott decision. It has been so from the beginning of the Government. The party in power has made appointments with a view of carrying out its policy. They would not think of appointing a judge who entertained constitutional views different from those entertained by the party in power. Everybody knew that they were Republicans and would take the Republican view of the Constitution. It was talked of frequently not as anything wrong. It was not regarded as wrong to appoint Swayne and Miller and Chase, who had all denounced the Dred Scott decision. It was well known that their views on the habeas corpus and other questions corresponded with the policy of the Administration. They were appointed to carry out the policy of the Administration.

Has anything occurred recently to show that that is not the policy of the gold party? Has it not been the policy of the gold party to appoint gold men? Name a man appointed to the Supreme Court bench since the silver question has become a political question who has not publicly announced his allegiance to the gold standard. Point to one.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly; I am always open to questions.

Mr. CAFFERY. Do I understand the Senator to say that the policy of the Republican party was to give legal-tender character to the greenbacks?

Mr. STEWART. It was.

Mr. CAFFERY. And the court was so fixed, packed, to use the term, as to bring about a decision in conformity with that view?

Mr. STEWART. That is right.

Mr. CAFFERY. Is the reverse true, that the Democratic party at that period was opposed to the Republican financial policy of giving legal-tender character to greenbacks?

Mr. STEWART. Most of them were, because they were opposed to the war. They hung back. Now it has turned around. The Republican party are now against greenbacks and they are against the power of the Government to issue them, because they are opposed to prosecuting this war cheaply. They want to prosecute it in the interest of gold monopoly. They occupy the position which the Democrats occupied during the war of the rebellion, viz, that nothing is money but gold. They have changed sides; that is all.

In the same sense that the court was packed before in favor of the power of the Government to create money, it is being packed now by every appointment made to maintain the gold standard. Do you suppose anybody could get a nomination, with a gold-standard President in the chair, to a place on the Supreme Bench if it was not known that he belonged to the gold party? It is well known that Justice Strong and Justice Bradley were in favor of the greenbacks, the legal tenders, before they were appointed as well as afterwards. They were in good standing in the Republican party. Their views were well understood, and their appointment was sufficient to change the result. There were three Republicans on the bench—Miller, Swayne, and Davis—whose opinions were known before any decision was rendered. The only doubt was as to how the Chief Justice would decide. However he might decide, the case would be affirmed.

The idea that we had no knowledge until the decision was rendered, that we were in doubt about it, is absurd. We knew how they stood on the question. Everybody knew it, and it was a pretty interesting question at that time. I know I took considerable interest in it. I did not want to have taken from the Government the power to create money. I did not know so much about the question then as I do now, but I did know that it was the business of the Government and not of private parties to create money. It would have been a terrible calamity if it had been held that the Government of the United States did not possess that power. Great Britain has held from the beginning that the power to create money is a part of the sovereign authority. Every civilized country has held it. The Democrats contended that although it is an attribute of sovereignty to create money the Constitution does not confer that power upon the Government.

The Democrats were mistaken then. They were mistaken about a good many things. I differed with them then as I differ with the Republican party now. The Republican has adopted nearly all the mistakes of the Democratic party. They are advocating the same ideas for which some years ago they charged the Democratic party with being traitors and copperheads. Copperheadism and a denial of the power of the Government to issue legal-tender money were equivalent expressions at that time. Now we see in the press the words "copperhead," "traitor," "sneak," "anarchist," "Bryanite" applied to men who insist that the Republican party was right when it had the doctrine established that the sovereign authority existed in the United States to create money, without which it could not maintain its existence as a nation, as was held in the celebrated mixed-money case in Elizabeth's time. It was held that England must have that power in order to exist and maintain itself as an independent state.

We who claim that the Republican party was right, and contend for Republican principles of thirty years ago, are denounced in unmeasured terms. I believe the Republican party was right in that respect, and it was a cardinal doctrine with me, and when the Republican party left that it left me. It left me when it left the principles of finance which it had advocated during the war and which it professed to believe after the war.

When it was found out that silver had been demonetized, the Republican party said that it would restore it. I believed that was the intention for some years. My friend the Senator from New Hampshire wants his party to make another promise to restore silver. What is the use? They can not keep their word. They have environments that hold them like a vice. They have to follow Wall street and Lombard street. They can promise as much as they please. The money party will have a party. It has always had a party. It has got the Republican party, and it is going to keep it. It has money enough, and will keep it. Nobody can get the Republican party away from it. The money power wants to rob the Government of its power to create legal-tender money, because it wants to turn it over to the banks. It wants bank issues.

The Democratic party now have their eyes open. The great mass of the Democratic party is now the patriotic party—the party which believes in the people, believes in the Government. It is opposed to gold monopoly; it believes the Government has a better right to create money than bank presidents or bank corporations; it believes the Government is more to the people than the banks. That is the situation.

The idea of trying to make it appear that these two judges were not appointed in pursuance of the policy of the Republican party is absurd. Call it packing the court if you will. It has always been packed in the same way by the party in power. The question of packing the court was discussed the whole time during which the Hepburn case was pending in the court. Here was a question on which the court was probably equally divided. It turned out that it was 5 to 3 for affirming the decision. The attempt to make it appear that the legal-tender question was not an important one in putting judges on the bench is as plausible as it would be to contend that human nature has lost its characteristics. So long as human nature remains the same, so long as the Government is administered by men, each party will attempt to carry out its policy, and it will resort to all legitimate means—if it does not go any farther than that we do not object—and from the foundation of the Government until now every appointment upon the Supreme Bench has been made with a view to the position of the judge upon great leading questions.

I do not want to characterize the income-tax decision, but I will say that it was an unfortunate decision for the court as it was an unfortunate decision for the people. It was of the character of the Dred Scott decision. It was an unfortunate decision, although made by a great and conscientious man, one of the ablest men who ever adorned the bench, but his political leanings took him that way. Nobody accused him of any corrupt desire, but it was a most unfortunate decision, because it was against the spirit of the age, which has since been developed. It was not known to exist at that time.

This decision, however honestly made, reversing the practice of the country for a hundred years in regard to the income tax, is a most unfortunate decision, because it is against the sense of justice deeply implanted in the breasts of millions of American people. They feel that wealth should contribute its part to the expenses of the Government. They feel the injustice of the decision, and a decision rendered thus can not stand.

I know the Democratic party was censured because it proposed to do as all parties have, and change the policy, change the court when it could obtain the power to do it in a legitimate way, just as Mr. Lincoln changed it from a proslavery court to an abolition court, just as President Grant changed it from a court believing that the Constitution did not confer upon the Government the power to issue legal-tender money to a court believing in that power, just as for the last ten years every new judge appointed has been a gold monometallist.

You may call it by any name you please. Such is the fact. The idea that the Democratic party is proposing a revolutionary doctrine when it declares if in power it will follow the precedents and appoint men who believe in the policy of the party in power, which is that wealth should contribute its legitimate proportion, is absurd. If the Republican party continues in power it will appoint men who will sustain the income-tax decision, and that is one of the questions before the American people. The Dred Scott decision made an issue between slavery and liberty. It would not down until it drenched the country in blood.

You, by this decision, have made an issue between justice and wrong. You have made the issue between the rights of the people and the rights of the few, which can not be settled until the people have been heard and have an administration that will appoint judges in harmony with their views and in harmony with the precedents for a hundred years. The idea of saying that we are anarchists, that we are packing the court when we seek to establish a policy, is absurd.

Besides, I think there is nothing more pernicious than the pretense that any department of this Government is above criticism. It is only criticism that keeps them in order. Congress needs criticism. The Executive needs criticism—I mean fair and honest criticism—and the courts need it as much as anybody else. Our Government is divided into three coordinate departments supposed by the Constitution to be equal. Does anybody suppose any one department would remain within its jurisdiction if it were not for the criticism coming from the others or from the people?

Free government can not exist without criticism. The pretense that by putting a man on the Supreme Bench you make him infallible is too absurd for consideration, and the doctrine ought not to be preached in the Senate or elsewhere. I repudiate it. Every man in office must stand in the electric light of criticism. If he can not stand it, if the light is too strong for him, let him get out of the way.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator from Nevada permit an interruption?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is simply to make a statement in connection with the matter the Senator is referring to.

Mr. STEWART. I yield.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator alludes to the change of opinion on the part of the court by political influence, and perhaps in this connection it would not be out of place to recite what Lincoln stated at the time of the Dred Scott decision. I quote from one of the Lincoln-Douglas debates. Referring to the Dred Scott decision, he said:

Somebody has to reverse that decision, since it is made; and we mean to reverse it, and we mean to do it peaceably. We propose so reversing it as to have it reversed, if we can, and a new judicial rule established upon that subject.

Mr. STEWART. That has been the contention from the foundation of the Government. Every party has been trying to do the same thing. It tries to make the decisions of the Supreme Court harmonious with its political views, believing its political views to be just. This touches the power of the Government, whether it shall have power to maintain its own existence by the issuance of legal-tender money or whether it shall be relegated to an inferior position to banks and monopolies. These questions will come up, and they must be settled by the people. You can not stop their discussion by pleading infallibility for any part of the Government.

Mr. BATE. Does the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] desire to go on now?

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield to the Senator from Tennessee if he is ready to proceed, as I prefer to speak in the morning.

Mr. BATE. It is immaterial to me.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well; I yield.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I am aware that in periods of intense excitement which, like the present, arouse the patriotism of the people it is expected that every State, every section, and all persons will present a united front to the enemy, and with one purpose pledge life and property to maintain the national honor. With that expectation I most heartily concur and represent the people of Tennessee when I pledge life and property to the defense of the country.

But, Mr. President, all wars are not identical either in their mode of conduct or in the consequences of their results. A war with a great power would present features that can not be recognized in one with Spain; a war which involved the existence of the nation or imperiled the liberties of the people would require sacrifices not necessary in a conflict for the relief of Cuba from the domination of Spain. We may not be able to set a day for the return of peace, but no man entertains a doubt that exhaustion must soon paralyze the efforts of a moribund nation, which, confronted by war with the United States, fights on the crater of a volcanic revolution at home.

Our enemy, Mr. President, in this war is indeed more an object of pity and consideration than of anger. Shorn of nearly all her provinces, which once embraced half the known world; deprived of the revenues wrenched from the overtaxed people of her colonies, she has fallen in the ranks of nations to the third rank, and with difficulty maintains even that position. Brave, persistent even to obstinacy, she has nevertheless retrograded, while other peoples have progressed. From the return of Ferdinand VII, in 1815, from captivity in France and his annulment of the constitution of 1812 her history has been that of revolution and civil war.

To restore some appearance of peace to the revolution-ridden people of Spain the French, in 1823, under the Duke of Angoulême, marched from the Pyrenees to the Straits of Gibraltar, compelling a cessation of civil war. The Carlists' war, beginning about 1830, has, with varying fortunes, become chronic, threatening new revolution every year since.

In an effort to recover the lost South American provinces her army assembled on the Island of Leon, revolted, and turned their arms, under Riego, against the Government of Spain.

The early collapse of a short-lived republic, which was interposed between the quarrelsome factions of the Bourbon dynasty, demonstrates that it is not the form of government but the incapacity of the Spanish people for any kind of government that brought this trouble upon her and upon us. The beautiful Island of Cuba has been in revolution, with active war, sometimes flagrant and some years in abeyance, but never in settled condition, for over thirty years. So that for nearly a century the history of Spain tells only of riot, revolution, and civil war, the "embarrassment of heavy income tax, the destruction of the public debt, the confiscation of titles and of land rights—of poverty at home and devastation in Cuba."

This rapid progress of disintegration and demoralization, never arrested, has sapped all foundations of the liberties of the people as well as their energy, industry, manufactures, and commerce. The usual leprosy of revolutionary convulsions, of Jacobin societies, the reign of terror, the "Order of the Hammer" (so called from the weapon which slew the poor priest Vivesa in prison), have been the accompaniments of government in Spain through all the years of the nineteenth century, until she stands at the threshold of the twentieth century—

The Niobe of nations, friendless and helpless—and her Senate telegraphing congratulations to Admiral Cervera for cleverly dodging the American squadrons.

A war with that nation can not demand that the Congress shall supplement the vast resources of 70,000,000 people with a loan of $500,000,000, nor $300,000,000. When Congress appropriated $50,000,000 to prepare the country for any emergency, there was a universal approval from the people which was a notification to the nations that this country, however unprepared for war, was able and ready to meet its demands with any and every necessary sacrifice.

The President's call for volunteers has been responded to with patriotic alacrity. There has not been the least intimation from any quarter that any supreme danger confronts the successful issue of the war. The navy of Spain certainly has not to this time exhibited any extreme eagerness to meet the Navy of the United States; and the triumphant guns from Manila voice a result of which that battle is only an example.

The army of Spain in Cuba has not inspired even the insurgents with any grave apprehensions as to the final result of an engagement there. We have been advised that the insurgents asked only recognition, and needed only arms, clothing, and provisions to enable them to drive the Spaniards from the island.

Where, then, are the indications of a great and prolonged war? What circumstances point to the necessity for negotiating a loan of $500,000,000?

The most intense patriotism, the most exuberant readiness to make any sacrifice in the line of duty, is entirely compatible with a reasonable and rational economy in the conduct of the war. Because the United States can overwhelm Spain with men and means affords no reason why we should smother her with a bond loan of $500,000,000.

The bill as it came to the Senate magnified the resources of the enemy by the very provisions which it made for revenue to carry on the war, and dignified the conflict beyond either its appropriateness or the estimation of the power and resources of Spain by any one of the powers of Europe. What more could the committee of the House have asked of Congress if our enemy had been Great Britain or Germany or France?

That bill added $90,000,000 of taxes to the revenues; it provided for the issue of $100,000,000 of Treasury notes, to be redeemed by taxes, and which were to supplement the $220,000,000 of cash in the Treasury on the 30th of April last. There had already been appropriated $50,000,000. Here, then, is a fund of $460,000,000. The largest estimate of the cost of the war for the first year is set at $300,000,000, but for abundant caution I will extend these figures to $365,000,000, or $1,000,000 per day, and there will remain a surplus of $95,000,000.

The monthly reports of the Treasury and the official statements of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee are so variant that plain people can not understand the real condition of our finances. For example, we are told that on the 9th of March, when Congress appropriated the $50,000,000, "there appeared to be in the Treasury a cash balance of $225,000,000," but that really there "was actually belonging to the United States on the 9th of March the sum of $165,000,000 in the Treasury," and that "$100,000,000 of that belonged to the greenback-redemption fund, leaving $65,000,000 available for all purposes of the Treasury."

Not satisfied with having cut the $225,000,000 of available cash, which the Treasury had published to the world, down to $65,000,000, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee proceeded further and sliced off $40,000,000 for the "working balance required in the Treasury;" so that while the country was felicitating itself on the possession of $225,000,000 of available fighting cash, and promptly appropriating therefrom $50,000,000, we are informed that the Treasury statement was all moonshine, and that on March 9 there was "only $25,000,000 belonging to the United States for meeting the fifty millions appropriation of the 9th of March," and that in order to meet the other twenty-five millions we must draw from two sources, neither of which belonged to the United States.

Thus, while the Secretary of the Treasury was proclaiming the easy condition of our finances and holding out to the Congress and the country that there was $225,000,000 available cash ready to meet appropriation, and the President, upon the faith of that official Treasury statement, asked Congress for the extraordinary appropriation of $50,000,000, now the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in order to pave the way for the passage of "a bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures," coolly tells the world that there was a deficit of $25,000,000 and that every dollar of the $225,000,000 belonged not to the United States, but to some other purpose, and that of the appropriation of $50,000,000 on March 9 only one-half could be drawn from funds belonging to the United States, and that the other half was taken from "the 5 per cent redemption fund" and from the "Pacific railroad bond fund."

Is it likely that such statements from the Treasury and such explanations by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee will "impress not simply Spain but the nations of Europe with the idea that the people of the United States possess the resources of cash revenue which we proclaimed to the world?"

Was this contradictory statement between the Treasury and its official spokesman in the other House made merely to hasten the borrowing of a large sum of money?

What is behind this proposed bond issue? Is the war to be conducted so as to exploit theories of finance without the knowledge of the people? Is there concealed about this bill the shackles of the gold standard? The suspicions suggested by questions like these are exciting the minds of the people, who fear that in liberating Cuba they may be enslaving their own energies and wealth to the domination of foreign and domestic financiers.

The people see no necessity for a bond issue at present; and they know that should an unexpected reverse demand extreme measures like this increase of the public debt, Congress is at hand to authorize the loan when the emergency is imminent. I repeat that the public credit is the sacred fund whose use should be resorted to only in extreme cases. Is it expected to astonish Europe with this enormous loan? Every nation knows the inexhaustible resources of this country; every statesman of Europe is aware that the United States can drive Spain from Cuba; hence every financier will laugh at, rather than admire, this hasty resort to the loan market rather than adopt a more prudent and economical mode of meeting the necessities of the present conditions. A readiness and promptness to borrow money, however high may be the national credit, does not indicate that high resolve of purpose which should characterize a brave and self-reliant nation.

Right here let me say that we have been charged, especially some of us here who voted upon a former occasion, in 1895, on what was known as the Allen amendment, with being inconsistent in this action; and we were so charged especially by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], who stated that we had given certain votes, and he read from the RECORD, which is correct. But, Mr. President, he failed to state the motive that actuated those who gave that vote. We did give that vote, but, sir, we were striving to gain successfully the free coinage of silver.

That was the dominating idea with us; that was the motive power that was governing us at the time, and when others sought to put amendments upon the measure that were not necessary, or at least would give it no assistance, but would rather encumber than assist it, and, fearing it would be a burden upon it, we voted against it, and we were consistent in so doing, because our idea of free coinage dominated the whole measure. That is the reason why it was done, and that explanation, I think, has not been heretofore given since the Senator from Kentucky, a few days since, sought to put Democrats on this side of this Chamber in a false attitude, but when explained, it shows they did not favor a bond issue and their votes bear no such construction, but so voted that they might thereby secure the free coinage of silver, or at least have a better chance for it. You will find it that way in the RECORD. I say in brief on that point that my friend the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], in his effort to prove himself to have been in the past an "antibond-selling Democrat," has left us in doubt if at present he is a probond-selling Democrat.

But without any purpose to question the right of any Senator to be for and against the same subject at different times, I must assure him that my vote in 1895 on the Allen proviso was given on the sole ground that I was unwilling to encumber a free-coinage bill with unnecessary provisions which might embarrass, but could not assist in passing, the free coinage of silver, and that, whatever changes in political attitude that Senator may see proper to make, I am now and have always been opposed to resorting to the credit of the country in the form of bonds, unless its very existence demanded that extreme measure.

The author of the bill which came to the Senate went into the highways and byways of taxation, hunting up the beer mugs of the laboring man, the cigars and tobacco of the smokers, the stamps on chewing gum, mineral waters, and patent medicines; he put "the screws" on foreign tonnage, and thus expects to scrape together from the consumers $90,000,000; but he avoided the incomes from accumulated wealth, the profits from prosperous business, and the dividends of wealthy corporations, all of which he leaves free from any contribution to the nation's war fund. And yet he opened his speech with an expression of the hope "that all the people of this country should stand shoulder to shoulder." Why not pocket to pocket—the millionaire's thousands supplemented by the poor man's pennies—all adding to and swelling the nation's war fund?

The most just and most equitable mode of taxation—one adopted in every civilized nation and capable of being adjusted to the demands of peace as well as to the exigencies of war—the taxation of incomes—has been entirely neglected for a system which exacts its contributions from the consumer and increases the cost of living to the poor. He advises the country that "war is expensive business." Then, why make it more expensive to the poor and laboring man than to the rich and prosperous capitalist? Why exact from the least able to pay a tax upon his frugal pleasures, his necessary beverage, his consoling and comforting pipe of tobacco, and let the dividends of wealth and the profits of prosperous enterprise escape every contribution to the defense of the country?

It is not out of place, Mr. President, when considering a bill to raise revenue, whether for purposes of war or peace, to bear in mind that our Government, as conducted for the last thirty years, has been the most extravagant and our people the most over-taxed among all the nations. A thousand millions of appropriations by one Congress gave us the name of the "billion dollars nation," and it has become the policy of the party in power to make the country deserve the sobriquet which characterizes, as well as measures, the extravagance of our Administrations. Economy in expenses is ridiculed, and appropriation is added to appropriation and taxes follow taxes with ever-increasing regularity.

All this has been characteristic of the Administrations in time of peace. Now, "war measures" are to continue and multiply all the schemes and devices of taxation. An increase of internal-revenue taxes is followed by a system of "stamp taxes" which, beginning with the medicine for baby in the cradle, follows with exasperating regularity every prescription, to the body in the coffin. Not only the medicine, but the perfumery and cosmetics are mixed and mingled with mineral waters and sparkling wines in the same category of taxes.

"Bonds, debentures, and certificates," "sales, contracts, and agreements," "bank checks, drafts, and certificates of deposit," "bills of exchange," both foreign and domestic; "express and freight," "telephone and telegraphic messages," "charter party," "insurances," "mortgage," "power of attorney," "protest of notes," and "warehouse receipts" all swell this "olla podrida" of irritation and inconvenience to the people. Then "excise taxes" continue the annoyance to every "person, firm, company, or corporation" in the United States, until the whole body of the people is compelled to be ever watchful lest the law is violated and punishments incurred.

The "tonnage" tax in the House bill was designed to extend the system to "all the world and the rest of mankind;" but fortunately the Senate committee has relieved the consumers from having the tonnage tax added to the freight charge and prices thus increased.

These taxes, taken as a system, bear heavily upon the consumption, and come home to the people with exasperating universality. They reach every article of consumption, taxing the food, the beverage, the medicine, the very sustenance of all the people, until they bring the war to the homes of our people rather than carry its hardships to the people of Spain.

No scheme of taxation has yet been invented or discovered that did not ultimately fall upon the people, who in the end are the payers. But the duty of Congress is to lessen the incidence of taxation and particularly is that duty pressing and urgent at this time, when the people are suffering from the effects of long-continued depression in business, an extraordinary fall in prices, and stagnation of enterprise all over our land.

The issue of United States Treasury notes suggested by the Senate's amendment is a ready remedy of temporary relief from taxation as well as convenient to the Government, and will carry on the war with Spain to a successful conclusion. The $150,000,000 provided for by the Senate's amendment should be ample for all contingencies until the Congress reassembles after adjournment. It would be a provision for one hundred and fifty days, or five months, until the session of Congress in December. I am in favor of Congress retaining its constitutional hold on the strings of the people's purse and "doling" out the money of the people only as real exigencies arise. After the war is over and when peace and prosperity have returned, and the people are able to bear taxation, then these Treasury notes can be dealt with as circumstances may suggest—retained as currency if needed, or funded, as the people may determine when that time arrives.

Mr. President, it is fashionable in certain circles of party politics to designate the Treasury note as "flat money"—a mere promise to pay, which, unsupported by a "gold reserve," has no standing as money. Such designation might be properly applied to the promise to pay of Spain, but whoever applied that term to the note of the Treasury of the United States forgets the history of the recent past and takes no note of the resources of this country, all of which are practically mortgaged by the power of Congress to "lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises to pay the debts of the United States."

The greenback was a mere promise to pay issued by the Government, and to-day it is redeemable in gold, notwithstanding the Treasury holds but $100,000,000 in "gold reserve" to meet $346,000,000 of greenbacks. They come and go. They are in to-day and out to-morrow, and no one knows or cares or takes trouble any longer about the greenback. It was made at one time a veritable scarecrow in our politics, but it has ceased to be a factor in the problems of politics since the country has stamped its purpose not to fund them as bonds.

The Treasury note is a greenback without a gold-reserve attachment, which is the least valuable quality that the people attach to the promises to pay of their Government. Conscious of the ability of the country to meet every obligation of its Government and firmly convinced of their own honesty and integrity, they are content to make them ever current, passing from hand to hand, paying the soldier in the tented field, maintaining him with commissary, quartermaster, and ordnance stores; discharging every function of currency among the people, and distasteful only to the banker, broker, speculator, and money changer.

I can not, Mr. President, give my approval to the retroactive taxation of this bill, whether applied to tobacco, patent medicines, or any other article. I know and appreciate the argument that without such retroactive taxation stocks on hand will either be sold at cheaper prices than taxed stocks or the new tax will be added, thus making a new profit on the stocks on hand. But either horn of that dilemma is preferable to that derangement of the retail business throughout the country which must follow the retroactive taxation of almost every article in store.

It is not, in my opinion, any desire to escape taxation that has caused the protest from all quarters of the country against retroactive taxation. It is a protest against the derangement of business, the dislocation of cost and expenses to profit, the changes in bookkeeping, the dissatisfaction which it will cause between buyer and seller. The amount of taxes that will accrue to the Government from the retroactive taxation on stocks on hand will not compensate for the trouble and inconvenience which will follow throughout the retail business of the country.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] meets the situation of the country with a prudent and patriotic proposition. It proposes a small tax on all "gains, profits, and income" over $2,000; and compels all "banks, banking institutions, trust companies, saving institutions, fire, marine, life, and other insurance companies, railroad, canal, turnpike, canal-navigation, slack-water, telephone, telegraph, express, electric-light, gas, water, street railway companies, and all other corporations, companies, or associations doing business for profit in the United States" to contribute to the expenses of the war. It further calls on the "salaries of officers" to meet the same exigencies of the nation that the beer mugs and pipes of poorer people have been made to pay.

That amendment rightly and properly recognizes a great principle in all systems of taxation, that when every resource of a people is lightly taxed it raises more revenue than when only a portion is heavily taxed; that the small contributions of all the people is more easily borne and paid, with less detriment to production, than when a part of the people are required to pay all the taxes. That amendment must successfully meet the objections of the Supreme Court to the last attempt to levy an income tax.

It exempts, under the ruling of the Supreme Court, all lands and the rents or profits of land from paying any tax to carry on the war.

I would, Mr. President, support an income tax drafted to meet the objections of the Supreme Court, notwithstanding I subscribe neither to the reasoning nor the ruling of that great tribunal on the question when last presented. I would vote for an income-tax amendment, because it would adjust taxation by an equitable rule to every resource within our reach and spread the expenses of the war with some equality over the fortunes of the rich as well as the misfortunes of the poor.

The present system of dividing the productions of labor and capital is so devised as to give labor a narrow support, whilst it enriches capital. The one struggles in poverty, the other lives in splendor. One devotes his life to toil for a bare existence and leaves his family to the charity of a heartless world. The present age has begun to feel the responsibility of the situation. It realizes that in the future, by no means remote, nature will institute a reckoning.

To avert the threatening danger is the supreme duty of this generation. It is especially the duty of the political economists and statesmen of the present day to devise a more just and equitable system of division, that will give labor its just proportion of the products. That which is known as "income tax," could it be enforced, would tend to relieve labor and put the burdens of the Government upon the capital.

It is a question of importance to determine whether it is a just and expedient method, whether allowable or not. It is a principle affirmed by Adam Smith, the great founder of political economy, "that the subjects of every state ought to contribute to the support of the government in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the state." "Each should contribute to the support of the state in proportion to the interest each has in the state. The violation of this rule produces the inequality of taxation." This principle can be introduced into the subject of collecting the revenue.

In defending the state against violence, the wage-earner is the equal of the wealthiest citizen, and often superior. It is to them that the state makes its appeal in its conflict for life, honor, and its rights. Their strength and courage are more valuable than dollars, ranks, and titles. In all countries this class fills the armies and furnishes blood and courage without the hope of honor, distinction, or pay. It is the policy of every free people to preserve by wise legislation an equality of rights which can only be done by preserving an equality of conditions. We mean not to degrade but to lift the poor and humble into the highest ranks that can be attained.

It is the true policy of a free people to place the highest estimate on humanity that unfettered genius can attain. Where a class exists owning the great portion of the wealth and another class owning none and depending on their service for existence, a conflict is inevitable. To preserve an equality of conditions is desirable if liberty is to be maintained. This inequality of conditions has been the ruin of all free governments. If we would not add another to the mournful wrecks that line the shores of time, we must be careful to avoid the hidden rocks on which other nations have been wrecked.

Without any reference to this question of equalizing conditions, this tax is required for the support of the Government. Our expenditures have lately increased and have grown into a vast sum aggregating nearly half a billion of dollars annually. With all the economy that can be practiced in time of peace it can not be reduced much below that sum for many years. There are many drains upon the Treasury that can be and should be stopped. These are too small in amount to affect seriously the great sum demanded.

It is our duty to search for every avenue to reasonable retrenchment. Instead of searching for new methods and new subjects for taxation, let us see if many ways of spending the people's money can not be dispensed with without injury to the public service. These drains have grown up in the course of the unparalleled extravagance engendered by war measures. The monstrous demands of the war, carried on by an expenditure of means never witnessed in human history, has engendered ideas by no means suited to the wants of a people when at peace with all nations.

We do not intend to reflect on the wisdom and patriotism of those who provided for the vast and imperious demands of the late war. They were suited for such a period. They familiarized the people with extravagance and a contempt for small things that have transformed our peaceful condition. There is no reason why the government of 70,000,000 people should cost but little more than the government of 50,000,000. Had not the public mind been infested by the abnormal conditions of a vast and destructive war, expenses would not have increased much beyond what they were at the commencement of the war.

This extravagance has many very injurious influences. It reaches to the morals and political integrity of the people. It destroys all reverence for the simplicity of our form of government by creating a misconception of official duty. It inspired an extravagant desire for political positions. Offices of dignity are now sought by those who would have them, while the people no longer seek the man for the place, and methods far from those contemplated by the fathers of the Republic are used to procure them.

I have merely alluded to a subject that demands more time than I have at present to give it. I return to that called "income tax," which is denied to us by a decision of our Supreme Court. This decision has a history. Yes, a history!

Income tax has the sanction of the most civilized and enlightened nations of the world. It has the concurrent approval of all the great masters in political economy. It is not an untried experiment. It has the sanction of a large experience. There is no rule that determines the justice of this tax so simple and plain as Adam Smith's:

That all the citizens should contribute to the support of their government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective ability.

The income tax comes from the wealth of the country and trenches not on the comfort of the working classes. If it infringes upon the income of the man of wealth, he has the means at hand to pay it. He is not compelled to search for the means to pay, as the wage-worker may be. He has a net sum above his expenses from which to draw. Of all taxes it is the easiest to pay and affects least the interests of society. It is paid out of the superfluous abundance. It is a tax paid by the man who has the money, and it is an easy matter for him to meet the demands of his country. How hard it is for the man to pay a tax whose living comes from his labor, whose existence depends on his health and his employment.

As I have stated, the war between the States has created extravagant and undemocratic ideas in regard to the operations of government. The collection and disbursement of such vast sums has tended to magnify the Federal Government and to diminish the respect and authority of the States. It has inspired ideas of the use that may be made of money at war with the integrity of a government of the people. In the business of expending such vast sums officers become oblivious to the struggles of the toiling millions whose hard earnings supply this abundance. The internal revenue and the customs duties are paid without the knowledge of the people.

Though they are not less onerous upon the people, affecting every article they consume, they press heavily without their knowing the cause. Under such a condition officers of the Government are not held to a responsibility for their course. Thus demoralization creeps upon the people unawares. The Government becomes a seductive glory whilst the toilers are descending to a species of slavery.

Under the unjust and unequal distribution of the proceeds of industry the property of the country is fast passing into the hands of a class. It has been estimated by excellent calculations that one-half of the property of this Republic is owned by 31,000 persons, who pay a small part of the public revenue. They pay comparatively nothing. Is there any injustice in requiring of this class a reasonable proportion of revenue? They have immense interests protected by the rest of the 70,000,000 of their fellow-citizens. Another authority says that 85,000 men own considerably more than one-half of the wealth of this country, who pay very little of the tariff revenue. These are the most desirous of escaping from the income tax.

It may not be possible at first to perfect the details of a law to tax incomes. Like all other tax laws, it will require adjustment from year to year as experience may dictate. I can not doubt the disposition of the American people as to the justice and expediency of this tax. The unbiased judgment of an intelligent people, yet free, can not fail to approve the principle of taxing each according to his ability and interest in the Government. These vast private accumulations have been realized from the advantages afforded by the Government. Legislation in favor of certain interests has multiplied many times the means of accumulations. It has not been the production of individual effort, the just reward of valuable service rendered. On the contrary, it has been by the cooperation of the Government in the advancement of personal interests.

Why should New York complain? Into her coffers have been poured the wealth of the Republic. Her great city has been the recipient of four-fifths of all the exports and imports of this vast country. If her citizens have grown rich it has been from the labors of vast productive and consuming regions that grasping financial and commercial forces have drawn to her. It is not in envy or dissatisfaction that I speak thus. Every American is proud of her vast forces that have laid under contribution the industrial resources of this continent.

As the vast productions of the whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific have been poured into her treasures, she has no reason to revolt against a fair share of taxation demanded by the wants of the Government that has always generously responded to the demands of her interests.

But since the highest tribunal under our Constitution has denied to the Congress the power to make incomes from both real and personal property contribute by taxation to the defense of the country, the Senate Committee on Finance has sagaciously developed the excise taxation into a system which subjects a part of the wealth of the country to its proper share in its defense.

This substitute for the lost power to tax the accumulated wealth of individuals has been directed by the Senate committee to the receipts from transportation, express business, telegraph and telephone, insurance, electricity, and banking, and to every corporation doing business in the United States. The same special annual excise tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent on gross receipts carries into effect the uniformity rule of taxation prescribed by the Constitution and to that extent restores to Congress the power to reach accumulated wealth and make it contribute to the public defense.

Under the present demand for an increase of revenue I shall sustain the imposition of stamp taxes as provided in the bill, as objectionable as it may be. I voted for the amendment for it not to apply to amounts under $100. But no consideration other than that of actual war would justify the alternative of resorting to a mode of taxation so irritating and harassing as that which "adhesive stamps" impose. I regard it as a war measure, pure and simple. And an amendment to the bill providing for the cessation of the taxation when the treaty of peace is signed would be gratifying to all classes of people who, while submitting to such taxation during actual war, desire its removal by limitation in the law which imposes that taxation.

There lies in the Treasury a vast volume of silver, which is money in every country, received by all people, and which could be made to contribute to the war fund. The House bill lets that large fund lie there idle and unused, and prefers the taxation of consumers and the borrowing of money by issuing bonds rather than use the silver already purchased and at present utterly useless so far as this war is concerned. We are told that there can be no seigniorage until there is coinage, and that as coinage of silver is not provided for by law, the seigniorage does not exist.

The author of the bill said that seigniorage "is the profit of the coined dollar and that there is no seigniorage until it is coined." But there is profit, the difference between the cost of purchase and the coined value, which is more a matter of arithmetic than of monetary science, and any clerk can ascertain the amount of that profit, which could be coined and become part of the war fund, and which will find ready use in the Army in Cuba and the Philippine Islands.

The amendment of the Senate directing the coinage of silver seigniorage will meet the approval of the country as a wise and prudent provision by which $42,000,000 will be added to the fund for carrying on the war. No effort is now being made for the free and unlimited coinage of silver with the House and the President, with his veto power, opposed to it. This effort, however, will be made at no distant day. The free coinage of silver is a constitutional right that can not be taken away from the people, one that will not be set aside, but renewed at an early day and in the proper manner. It is a policy that public interest requires, and it will be adopted, and ought to be. Having heretofore fully discussed this question in this Chamber, I forbear further criticism upon it just now, but when different conditions are upon us it will again be the rallying cry of mighty hosts.

The Congress has not exhibited any purpose to withhold from the Government any means necessary to a successful issue of the war. With a confidence hitherto unexampled in our history, an extraordinary appropriation of $50,000,000 was unanimously voted upon the first intimation from the President. The same prompt readiness will be always at the call of the Executive when the exigency is made plain to the Congress. But so long as $42,000,000 of silver lies idle and useless in the Treasury vaults, despised by the Executive and refused coinage by the Congress and denied even the poor privilege of being represented by "certificates" in the currency of the people, it is not money that is needed, but bonds that are asked.

That silver has already been paid for by the taxes of the people; but these bonds will have to be paid for, interest for thirty years and then the principal. Rather than use silver already bought and paid for, it is proposed to borrow money—to add new taxes and prolong their collection from "generation to generation."

For these reasons I can not, Mr. President, persuade myself that there exists at present any emergency upon the country calling for a prodigious loan of $500,000,000 or $800,000,000. So far as our forces have been permitted to fight, victory has crowned their efforts and added terror to our name.

It is the confident conviction of the country that once the restraining hand of authority is lifted from our fleet in the Gulf, Havana will fall an easier reward to the gallantry of our sailors than did Manila to the splendid dash of Dewey. The flying squadron, late in Hampton Roads, dragging heavily its anchors, anxious to get on the high seas and exchange compliments with the lost fleet of the Cape Verde Islands, has been put afloat and is ready for battle.

The insurgents in Cuba ask only the loan of arms and ammunition and the moral support of our recognition, and they will bring the Spanish army to a speedy surrender. None of these conditions require a loan of five hundred nor three hundred millions. Before this bill can go into effect all probabilities point to a conclusion of the war without raising so enormous an amount of money. But if I am too sanguine of my country's power and the gallantry of the soldiers and sailors, the act of borrowing can be set in force by Congress at a future day, when the country stands face to face with a more threatening condition than any man can find to-day along the whole horizon of war.

I recognize, Mr. President, the wisdom of the advice not to under-rate your enemy, but is there not equal wisdom in not overtaxing your people beyond the necessities of the situation? I am opposed to using the excitement of war to exploit a system of finance which in time of peace failed to receive the approval of the people. A Democratic President increased the public debt by over $200,000,000 to protect the credit of the country, a reason quite as plausible as that set up now that this country is in danger from Spain. And yet Mr. Cleveland met with condemnation because the people then did not believe there was any real necessity for an increase of the public debt.

This, Mr. President, is the time for cooperation rather than criticism; and remitting the latter to the more convenient time of peace, I have cooperated in the past and shall in the future cooperate in every measure for a vigorous prosecution of the war to an honorable peace. The truest economy will be found in the most vigorous prosecution of the war. Pressing the enemy at every point, assailing his forces alike on sea and land, will be the saving of lives and means. No people were ever more willing to meet every proper demand on their resources than are the people of the United States at present, but they do not want that done by putting a mortgage in the shape of interest-bearing bonds upon the taxpayers of this and future generations.

If existing taxation, supplemented by the Senate's amended bill, with the amendments thereto, shall prove insufficient and the credit of the Government must be called upon, the Senate's amendment relieves the situation by providing for the issue of one hundred and fifty millions of Treasury notes, carrying no interest, but of equal capacity with the existing greenbacks.

The example of the late war between the States is not applicable to the present war with Spain. Then the very existence of the United States was at risk and the credit of the Government rested on an uncertain and desperate issue. Hence public credit vacillated with the shifting fortune of battle. But now no such uncertain issue is on trial. We shall drive Spain out of Cuba or we shall fail in that enterprise. But let the issue terminate as it may, nothing can affect the United States beyond disappointment and loss of prestige.

And while every sacrifice will be freely made to avert disaster, a twenty or thirty year bond loan, of either $500,000,000 or $800,000,000, will not be more efficacious than an issue of Treasury notes. It would be ridiculous to take a sledge hammer to crack an eggshell when one can do it with a salt spoon, and the country can drive Spain from Cuba, can hold the Philippines, and can seize Puerto Rico on taxation properly adjusted without resorting to the supreme remedy of borrowing money from future generations. We can pay as we go and still win easily.

ADDA F. THOMPSON.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I should like the consent of the Senate to call up a little pension bill, which is No. 1211 in the Order of Business, and which will take but a minute. The amount of pension proposed is only $12 a month.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not hear the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. KYLE. I wish consent for a few moments for the consideration of a little pension bill. I understand the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to the floor now. He is not in the Chamber at this instant, but will be here in a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, which will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 4594) granting a pension to Mrs. Adda F. Thompson, which was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, before the name "Adda," to strike out "Mrs.;" in line 7, before the word "late," to strike out "deceased, and;" and in line 8, after the word "her," to insert "a pension;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Adda F. Thompson, widow of David G. Thompson, late of Company F, One hundred and seventy-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, as it has been read; but I give notice that I shall hereafter object to the consideration of other bills which may be presented.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee on Pensions, which have been stated.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Adda F. Thompson."

PAY OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report testimony in relation to the condition of Indian reservations in Oklahoma Territory, and other matters, be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

WAR REVENUE BILL.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield to me to offer a proposed amendment?

Mr. HALE. I will yield to the Senator, and then I shall insist on the regular order.

Mr. ALLEN. It is a part of the regular order.

Mr. HALE. Of course an amendment to the bill is in regular order.

Mr. ALLEN. I offer an amendment to be proposed as a proviso to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island. I ask to have it read and printed.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That, except as in this act provided, the Secretary of the Treasury shall not hereafter have authority to issue any bond or interest-bearing obligation of the United States unless theretofore specifically authorized to do so by special act or resolution of Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. The regular order.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order of business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from North Carolina had the floor, and I hope he will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not prepared to go on this evening. If the Senate is ready to take up and act on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], I prefer to speak after the amendment is acted on. It is now pending, and I do not care to discuss it.

Mr. GORMAN. As I originally proposed the amendment now pending it was as a substitute for amendment No. 177 of the committee, and of course it was not subject to amendment. I wanted a direct vote upon the proposition whether we would tax gross receipts of corporations. At the suggestion of members of the Committee on Finance, I withdrew it so that they might have a direct vote upon the amendment of the committee. I supposed at the time that by common consent I should then have a vote directly upon my amendment, but the RECORD does not bear out the impression I had. So my proposition as it stands now is a separate and independent one, open to amendment. I withdraw it for the moment, reserving the right, which I shall have when we reach another portion of the bill, to offer it as a substitute for another amendment, with a view of getting a direct vote of the Senate as to whether we will tax gross receipts of corporations. I withdraw the amendment for the time being.

Mr. STEWART. In renewing it, I hope the Senator will ascertain to his satisfaction whether it ought to be one-half or one-fourth. I believe there will be a stronger vote for one-fourth, which will accomplish the same purpose, and if put in that shape we will get a square vote, without division, among those who favor the proposition.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland is again offered, or whenever it is offered, I shall ask to have the Senate amend it by striking out the exemption clause of $250,000, because I think the amendment would have no force or effect with that clause in it. In view of the fact that the Senator withdrew it for the purpose of having it voted upon as it now stands, I thought it was no more than fair to him that I should give this notice.

Mr. GORMAN. I desire to be equally frank with the Senator. I will say that my object in withdrawing it at this moment is to enable me to offer it in a form in which it will not be subject to amendment. So, if the Senator from South Dakota desires to offer an amendment covering the point he has in mind, I will be very glad to consider it. The reason why I withdraw it now is that I may have a direct vote upon the amendment as I shall offer it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say that I think it will be impossible for the Senator to accomplish his object except in the way of getting a direct vote. He may be able to do that, but I certainly shall be able, after the bill is perfected and out of the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, to offer my amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the next amendment in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment on page 4, beginning in line 25.

Mr. ALLEN. If the committee are through with their amendments, I have one or two which I desire to offer. There seems to be a lull in the proceedings and nobody ready to do anything. I do not know but that I might offer my amendments now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that there are a number of amendments offered by the committee which have been passed over during the progress of the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if the committee propose to go on this afternoon?

Mr. ALLISON. That is my understanding.

Mr. ALLEN. I wanted to suggest that if the committee were not ready, and they do not seem to be ready at this moment, I have one or two very important amendments which I think ought to become a part of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] had the floor, and now declines to proceed. There are several amendments which were agreed to in committee, a great many of them formal amendments, and I shall ask that they be now taken up. As I understand, the Senators who have in charge the amendments relating to the seigniorage, etc., prefer not to have a vote on them at this moment. There are several formal amendments which I will send to the desk and ask to have adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, strike out the words "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 13, on the same page, I ask to modify the amendment already agreed to by striking out the same words in lines 13 and 14.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment on page 1, line 13, by striking out the words "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 1, line 7, I believe the amendment numbered 1 has already been agreed to. I move further to amend it in line 7 by striking out the word "or" and inserting the word "and" and striking out the comma after the word "manufactured."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 2, line 1, after the word "sales," I move to insert "by collectors to brewers."

Mr. SPOONER. How does that change it?

Mr. ALLISON. It makes it more certain.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 2, page 2, I move to strike out "by this section" and insert "the payment of said tax."

Mr. SPOONER. Let the amendment be stated.

Mr. ALLISON. As it will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That a discount of 7½ per cent shall be allowed on all sales by collectors to brewers of the stamps provided for the payment of said tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 3, line 5, I move to insert, after the word "that," the words "from and after July 1, 1898."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On the same page, after the word "imposed," in line 6, I move to insert "annually."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move the amendments which I send to the desk. If Senators will look at their bills, they will see the changes proposed.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 8, strike out the word "fifty" and insert "twenty-five;" in the same line strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" in line 9 strike out the words "for each license;" in line 10 strike out the word "fifty" and insert "twenty-five;" in line 11 strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five;" and after the words "two dollars," in line 11, insert "and in estimating capital surplus shall be included. The amount of such annual tax shall in all cases be computed on the basis of the capital and surplus for the preceding fiscal year."

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if the effect of this amendment is to increase the tax on to tax a little $25,000 bank?

Mr. ALLISON. The effect of the amendment is to make the minimum capital $25,000.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It decreases the tax.

Mr. ALLISON. It decreases the tax upon the smaller banks; that is to say, as we originally proposed the amendment the tax was $100 as a minimum upon a bank having a capital of $50,000. We now reduce it to $25,000 and make the corresponding tax $50.

Mr. GORMAN. In other words, you include by the amendment the banks of only $25,000 capital.

Mr. ALLISON. They were included before, but they paid $100 and now they pay $50. I will say that this amendment was suggested to us by the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] on the other side of the Chamber, and I think it is a wise amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments which have been stated.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 4, line 7, after the word "person," I move to insert a comma and the words "firm or company."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On the same page, line 13, I move to strike out the word "any" and insert "every."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. After the word "person," in line 13 of the same page, I move to insert a comma and the words "firm or company."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 20, on the same page, after the word "person," I move to insert a comma and the words "firm or company."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 4, line 25, the committee recommend a modification of the provision relating to insurance agents. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 25, it is proposed to strike out the words "foreign insurance" and insert "insurance;" in the same line strike out "fifty" and insert "twelve;" in line 1, page 5, strike out the words "who shall act" and insert "firm or company having an office or place of business and acting;" in the same line strike out the word "foreign;" and in line 3, same page, strike out "foreign."

Mr. SPOONER. Let the clause be read as it will appear if amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Six. Insurance agents shall pay $12. Every person, firm, or company having an office or place of business and acting as agent of any fire, marine, life, mutual, or other insurance company or companies shall be regarded as an insurance agent.

Mr. ALDRICH. The word "a" should be changed to "an."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The change will be made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 6, line 12, I move to strike out the words "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 14, the committee ask that amendment numbered 5 may be disagreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee amendment is to strike out "twelve" and insert "sixteen."

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that it may be disagreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On the same page, line 21, I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I remember now that these amendments have been passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They have been.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendments which have been passed over may be now considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 21, page 6, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out "fifty" and inserting "sixty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I ask that the amendment as amended may be agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended. Without objection, it is agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Committee amendment No. 7, line 23, page 6, is to strike out "$2" and insert "$1."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Amendment No. 8, line 26, page 6, is to strike out "$4" and insert "$3.50."

Mr. ALLISON. Strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Amendment No. 9, page 7, line 3, is to strike out "$2" and insert "$1.50."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Turning back to page 4, line 25, the amendment there was passed over, and should be agreed to as amended, if it has not already been done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the amendment? The Chair hears none; and the amendment reported by the committee is agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 8, page 7, I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. In line 8, page 7, it is proposed to strike out "of smoking and fine-cut chewing tobacco."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, strike out all of the paragraph after "packages," in line 8, down to and including the word "thereon," in line 16, and insert "thereof containing 1½ ounces and 3¼ ounces."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wish to ask about the proposed amendment as read.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the Secretary read the proviso as it will read if amended.

The SECRETARY. Commencing in line 7, the proviso will read:

Provided, That in addition to the quantity of tobacco and snuff in packages now authorized by law, there may be packages thereof containing 1½ ounces and 3¼ ounces.

Mr. GRAY. I would ask the Senator from Iowa what is the object of the change in the size of those packages; to what does it relate?

Mr. ALLISON. Under existing law the packages are composed of an even number of ounces. Changing the tax, we propose instead of a 2-ounce package to authorize a package of 1½ ounces, and instead of a 4-ounce package a package of 3¼ ounces.

Mr. GRAY. Why do you have a fraction instead of the convenient integral number of 2 ounces and 4 ounces?

Mr. ALLISON. The object is to adjust the bill to the trade. A 2-ounce package now has a given price at retail, and increasing the tax, that package, to sell for the present price, must be reduced one-eighth.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Iowa will excuse me, I can perhaps explain to the Senator from Delaware in a second what the object is. Eighty per cent of the smoking tobacco sold in the United States is sold in 2-ounce packages to-day for 5 cents. The tax has been increased from 6 cents to 12 cents, or will be by this bill.

Mr. GRAY. Twelve cents on what—the 2-ounce package?

Mr. ALDRICH. No; on the pound. The proposition is to get a package of smoking tobacco, equivalent to a 2-ounce package now, with the increase of tax, to be sold for 5 cents. In other words, a 14-ounce package will now be sold for 5 cents instead of a 2-ounce package.

Mr. GRAY. Is it not a deception on the trade rather than a clearing up of difficulties if you pass a 14-ounce package as a 2-ounce package?

Mr. ALLISON. No; they will all be stamped as 14-ounce packages. A 14-ounce package stamp will be put upon them. There will be no difficulty.

Mr. GRAY. And the same in regard to snuff?

Mr. ALLISON. The same in regard to snuff; all packages of tobacco, whether chewing, smoking, or other forms.

Mr. GRAY. I rose because I have heard some complaint from those who are manufacturing snuff. One of my constituents is in that delectable and pungent trade. The manufacturers complain of this fractional reduction on snuff packages because it tends to deception by reason of the impossibility of distinguishing between a 2-ounce package and a package of 1 ounce and a large fraction.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that their complaint originated from the fact that we had increased the tax to 16 cents and makes a four-fifth ounce package, which they objected to. But we have stricken all that out now and retained a tax of 12 cents a pound, retaining all the packages in existence and providing only for a change in two classes, namely, the 2-ounce package and the 4-ounce package.

Mr. GRAY. Then I suppose the committee has heard the men who are in the trade.

Mr. ALLISON. I assure the Senator this does not affect the snuff trade.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if this is not a good-natured effort on the part of the committee to shift the burden of this tax from the manufacturer to the consumer?

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that we computed that very carefully, and we find it will be impossible, if we retain the package of the size we have now provided for, 1½ ounces, although I may say to the Senator that in my observation and belief the consumer pays this tax in all cases.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The plain English of this proposition is that it is to the interest of the trade to be able to sell small packages of tobacco at a nickel. If we place a tax in addition to the present on tobacco, it costs the manufacturer to make that package of tobacco more than a nickel, and he is compelled to sell it above a nickel. Now we propose to enable him to reduce the size of the package, so that he can maintain the same price. That is all there is of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. The next is amendment No. 15.

Amendment No. 15 was to strike out all after line 16, page 7, down to and including line 18, page 10, in the following words:

And there shall also be levied and collected, upon all the articles in this section enumerated and described which have been manufactured or imported and removed from the factory or custom-house before the passage of this act bearing the tax stamps heretofore required to be affixed to such articles for the payment of the tax thereon and which are at the time of the passage of this act held and intended for sale by any person, an additional tax equal to the difference between the tax already paid on such articles at the time of removal from the factory or custom-house and the tax hereby levied upon such articles manufactured and removed from the factory or custom-house after the passage of this act, namely, a tax of 6 cents per pound upon all tobacco and snuff, however prepared; a tax of $1 per thousand on cigars, made of tobacco or any substitute therefor, and weighing more than 8 pounds per thousand; a tax of $1 per thousand on cigars, made of tobacco or any substitute therefor, and weighing not more than 8 pounds per thousand; and a tax of $1 per thousand on cigarettes, made of tobacco or any substitute therefor, and weighing more than 3 pounds per thousand, and of $1 per thousand on cigarettes, made of tobacco or any substitute therefor, and weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand.

Every person, either as owner or dealer or as a broker, commission merchant, or other agent for the owner or dealer, having on the day succeeding the passage of this act any of the above-described articles in stock for sale, and which have been removed from the factory where produced or custom-house through which imported, bearing the proper stamp expressing the rate of tax payable thereon at the time of such removal, shall make a full and true return of the quantity thereof, in pounds as to the tobacco and snuff, and in thousands as to cigars and cigarettes, so held on that day, under oath and in such form and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe. Such return shall be made and delivered to any collector or deputy collector of internal revenue upon demand, or, if not previously rendered, to the collector of the district within thirty days after the passage of this act; and on or before said day, and before selling or parting with the possession of any article above described after the passage of this act, the owner or dealer or other person having possession of said articles shall purchase and procure from the collector of the district the proper stamps for the payment of the additional taxes hereby levied upon said articles, and shall affix such stamps to the packages containing such articles, and cancel the same in the manner now by law provided for the attachment and cancellation of stamps to and upon such articles or packages. And any such article or packages of such articles which shall be removed from such stock or from the place where situated on the day succeeding the passage of this act, or which shall be found after thirty days after the passage of this act, not bearing the stamp or stamps denoting the additional tax hereby levied on such articles, properly canceled as by law required, shall be forfeited to the United States, and the person so removing such article unstamped as herein required or not having the stamp properly canceled, or having such article in stock or possession, exposed or intended for sale, not bearing the stamp denoting such additional tax, properly canceled, shall be liable to the payment of double the amount of additional tax due upon such article and to a penalty of not less than $1 nor more than $100 for each such insufficiently stamped article so removed or held in possession.

Every person willfully failing or refusing to make the required return at the time and in the manner provided by law or regulation shall forfeit and pay double the amount of tax levied by this act, and a penalty of not less than fifty nor more than five hundred dollars; and for making a false and fraudulent return shall incur a penalty of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. ALDRICH. That amendment has been read, and I think it is not necessary to read it again. I ask that it may be acted upon without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment numbered 15. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Amendment No. 16 has not been agreed to?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not. It will be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 21, before the word "thousand," strike out the words "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

And for the expense connected with the assessment and collection of the taxes provided by this act there is hereby appropriated the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be required, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the employment of such deputy collectors and other employees in the several collection districts in the United States, and such clerks and employees in the Bureau of Internal Revenue as may, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, be necessary for a period not exceeding one year, to be compensated for their services by such allowances as shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was amendment No. 17, to strike out all after the word "revenue," in line 6, page 11, down to and including the word "expenses," in line 15, as follows:

Provided, That not exceeding $25,000 of this appropriation may be used in the employment of not to exceed ten additional revenue agents, whom the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to employ, such agents to be known and designated as internal-revenue agents in addition to the number now authorized by section 3152 of the Revised Statutes as amended; and the existing provisions of law in all other respects shall apply to such agents, their duties, compensation, and expenses.

And to insert:

And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to employ ten agents, to be known and designated as internal-revenue agents, in addition to the number now authorized in section 3152 of the Revised Statutes as amended, and the existing provisions of law in all other respects shall apply to the duties, compensation, and expenses of such agents.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to amendment No. 17.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Amendment No. 18 has not been agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Amendment No. 18, in the subhead, after the word "dealers," to strike out the word "peddlers;" so as to read:

Tobacco dealers and manufacturers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be agreed to without objection. It is agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer an amendment to come in on line 24, page 11.

The SECRETARY. Page 11, line 24, strike out the word "on" and insert in lieu thereof the word "from;" on page 12, line 2, strike out the words "are hereby" and insert in lieu thereof "shall be and hereby are;" in the same line, strike out the words "per annum" and insert the word "annually," and after the word "follows," in the same line, insert a comma and the words "the amount of such annual taxes to be computed in all cases on the basis of the annual sales for the preceding fiscal year;" so that the section as amended will read:

Sec. 2. That from and after July 1, 1893, special taxes on tobacco dealers, peddlers, and manufacturers shall be, and hereby are, imposed annually, as follows, the amount of such annual taxes to be computed in all cases on the basis of the annual sales for the preceding fiscal year, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The word "peddlers," in line 1, page 12, the Chair understands is to be stricken out. That is amendment No. 19, in the clause just read by the Secretary.

Mr. ALLISON. Amendment No. 19 should be agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be agreed to without objection. Amendment No. 20 will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 3, after the word "sales," strike out "do" and insert "shall;" so as to read:

Dealers in leaf tobacco, whose sales shall not exceed, etc.

Mr. ALLISON. I propose a substitute for the whole paragraph. I ask that it may be read as I send it to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the paragraph beginning with line 3, page 12, down to and including line 8, on the same page, so as to read as follows:

Dealers in leaf tobacco whose annual sales shall not exceed 50,000 pounds shall each pay $6. Dealers in leaf tobacco whose annual sales shall exceed 50,000 and shall not exceed 100,000 pounds shall pay $12, and if their annual sales shall exceed 100,000 pounds shall pay $24.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed as a substitute.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a substitute for the paragraph beginning on line 3 and ending on line 8, and which covers amendments 20, 21, and 22, in the following words:

Dealers in leaf tobacco whose annual sales shall not exceed $5,000 shall each pay $6. Dealers in leaf tobacco whose annual sales shall exceed $5,000 and shall not exceed $10,000 shall pay $12, and if their annual sales shall exceed $10,000, shall pay $24.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senator for an explanation of this departure from the rule of dollars and running into pounds. Does it not complicate the matter and involve us in all sorts of calculations as to the ascertainment of the tax?

Mr. ALLISON. The Internal-Revenue Office state that it is difficult to compute these taxes in dollars. They have an accurate estimate and statement of the number of pounds used on purchases, but they have not an accurate statement of the value in dollars. So they ask us to substitute pounds for dollars as an equivalent, and I think it a great improvement. That is all there is about it. It is a substitution of the average value in dollars for pounds of tobacco purchased, they having a record of the pounds and not a record of the money value.

Mr. GORMAN. But take the different grades of tobacco; a dealer in a much higher grade in value will sell a larger amount. Would not the rule operate unequally?

Mr. ALLISON. That is one of the difficulties that it is desired to overcome. It is impossible to compute the different grades in money value, so that ample provision has been made in pounds.

Mr. GALLINGER. The tax is very small.

Mr. ALLISON. It is very small, of course.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand that it is very small, but it is easy to ascertain the gross amount of the sales of any one of these establishments, whether it is $5,000 or $50,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the Senator from Maryland will understand that they have in the office of the Internal-Revenue Commissioner at all times a record of the number of pounds sold, and they have no record of the amount of sales of the various dealers in value. It will be necessary to examine the books and to have returns in the case of money values put upon them; but they can easily assess the taxes by their own records as to the number of pounds sold in each case. The taxes are very small. The committee recommend the striking out of all the tax on the sales of tobacco dealers throughout the country. This applies only to dealers in leaf tobacco, whose number is very small in the country, and the tax itself is very small.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senator for information because my recollection is, indeed I know it to be a fact, that in ascertaining the amount of tax to be paid never before have we had any other measure than that of the number of dollars received by the dealer. He is required naturally to keep an account and he does keep an account of his gross receipts, and you measure his tax by that. If I am a dealer and deal exclusively in Sumatra tobacco or any other tobacco that is worth $2.50 a pound, I may sell 10,000 pounds and I am only to pay a tax of $6, whereas the same amount, 10,000 pounds, of Virginia or Maryland tobacco, not worth one-twentieth part of that sum, will pay the same tax. It seems to me that that is an injustice and that the only fair measure can be the receipts from the gross sales.

In this section of the country, where the cheaper tobacco is dealt in, it would make us pay on the value of our article five or six times the amount of tax that would be paid on the high grade according to value. It would operate to exempt the Connecticut tobacco and the other high grades. I do not believe it is a fair tax. It should be imposed on the value.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Maryland may be right as respects this matter. We went over it very carefully with those who are familiar with the tobacco trade and who have been in the Internal Revenue Office for a great many years, and they furnished us these figures as to the relative amount. I can say to the Senator that they are very large figures for the amount of tax imposed. I have no doubt that by the amendment we have proposed the tax has been minimized rather than increased.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Iowa as to this matter? This seems to be a tax on dealers in leaf tobacco, that is, on tobacco in the first stage of its manufacture, on its way as bulk tobacco to its manufacture into snuff or whatever may be its ultimate form. Is not that tobacco afterwards taxed in its more matured manufactured state?

Mr. ALLISON. When it is manufactured. This is a license tax upon the dealer.

Mr. GRAY. It is a license tax on those who deal in leaf tobacco. What does the Senator estimate the amount of revenue that will be derived from this tax?

Mr. ALLISON. It is not large.

Mr. GRAY. How large? Can the Senator approximate it?

Mr. ALLISON. I should say $30,000 or $40,000.

Mr. GRAY. Does that compensate for the annoyance and inconvenience of the tax?

Mr. ALLISON. It will be about $300,000. It is a small tax.

Mr. GRAY. I do not think, in other words, that a tax ought to be levied for the sake of levying, but it ought to be levied with reference to the result to the Government. All taxes are interferences with the business transactions that they affect. Where the compensatory result does not justify the inconvenience, I should be in favor of striking it out altogether. But $300,000 is more than $30,000.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a great deal more. I was mistaken in the amount I first stated.

I will say to the Senator from Delaware that it is deemed necessary to keep a run of the sales of leaf tobacco, in order that the Internal Revenue Department may collect the tax on manufactured tobacco. It is one method that always prevailed until we reduced the tax to 6 cents a pound, when it was thought we could dispense with the tax on dealers in leaf tobacco. But it is the view of the Department that if the tax is 12 cents a pound there should be a small tax upon dealers in leaf tobacco, and this tax is very light indeed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator if this change does not make the tax the same upon cheap tobacco as upon high-priced tobacco?

Mr. ALLISON. It does.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am glad of the change, because it conforms with the theory of taxation in the bill, that of levying the burdens upon individuals without reference to the amount they are worth or their wealth, etc. I of course like to see the bill made uniform in accordance with Republican principles.

Mr. ALLISON. I have already stated (the Senator from South Dakota was doubtless otherwise engaged at the moment) that this is a very light tax and imposes no burden upon anybody; and it is much easier for the internal-revenue officers to estimate it upon the amount of tobacco sold rather than upon the number of dollars invested.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether this is not a new thing in the way of apportioning taxation?

Mr. ALLISON. It is new. It estimates the taxation upon the number of pounds sold and purchased rather than upon the number of dollars in value. It is supposed to be much more convenient and an easier method of collecting the tax by estimating it in this way, both for the man who pays it and for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue who estimates it.

Mr. MALLORY. It may be more convenient—I do not undertake to deny that—but certainly it is unjust. The tax comes out of the tobacco. On the more valuable forms of tobacco the tax is really lighter than on cheaper qualities of tobacco. The tax on Havana and Sumatra tobacco both is much lighter than upon the domestic tobacco. If that is true, it will be found that the more valuable tobacco will actually pay a less tax than cheap tobacco.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true; but a dealer in leaf tobacco buys dear and cheap tobacco. He does not buy all of one kind or value. The amendment is not worth a great deal of debate. We have minimized and simplified this tax. It is very satisfactory to the dealers, and absolutely so to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. If Senators think it an unjust tax, they can vote the amendment down.

Mr. MALLORY. It is certainly unjust.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I do not believe that this change in the tax was inspired at all by any desire to take advantage of the less valuable article, and yet I can see that in effect, while it may in some respects be more convenient to the Department, it does operate as a hardship upon those who deal in coarse and heavy tobacco, because the coarse and heavy tobacco—in which the profit lies upon the great quantity of sales rather than upon the large profit in any particular transaction—would have to pay many multiples more than the finer tobacco which brings a high price.

So far as tracing the tobacco is concerned, it seems to me that very probably the convenience has been very much exaggerated, because the tobacco trade is constantly under the inspection of the Internal Revenue Bureau. I think it would be wiser to follow the old plan, and it would be just.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator from Virginia what is the value, to his knowledge, of tobacco per pound as sold in Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. Ten or 11 cents is an average, I should judge.

Mr. ALLISON. This is all computed upon the minimum price. Fifty thousand pounds, at 10 cents a pound, is substituted here for $5,000.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It seems to me that the confusion about this matter comes from the idea that this is a tax upon tobacco. It is not a tax upon tobacco. It is a tax upon dealers in tobacco—a license for dealing in tobacco, to be regulated in some way. As the proposition first stood here, it was that a man who sold less than $5,000 worth of tobacco should pay $6 tax; if he sold between $5,000 and $10,000 worth, he should pay $12 tax; if he sold above $12,000, he should pay $24 tax. All the sympathy which has been displayed in the Senate about the unjust taxation could very easily be brought out by complaining that the man who sold only $2,500 worth of tobacco should be required to pay as much tax as a man who sold $50,000 worth. That you would say was inequitable. It is clearly unjust, as well as the other.

There must be some way of ascertaining who shall pay these different grades of $6, $12, and $24 a year. One tax is 50 cents a month; the other is $1 a month, and the other is $2 a month. The proposition is that a man who sells 50,000 pounds of tobacco instead of $5,000 worth of tobacco shall pay $6; if he sells between 50,000 and 100,000 pounds, he shall pay $12 tax; if he sells above 100,000 pounds, he shall pay $24. If he sells 101,000 pounds and his neighbor across the street sells 500,000 pounds, they pay the same tax. This is not exactly equitable; it is not precisely fair. These things must operate in some sort in an inequality in this way. It seems to me it is reasonable to assume that any man who sells 100,000 pounds of tobacco is likely to sell all kinds of tobacco. He is not likely to sell one particular class of tobacco. It may be that there are dealers who do that, but where a man sells 100,000 pounds and 200,000 pounds of tobacco of any grade a tax of 50 cents a month or a dollar a month is certainly not a very heavy tax on his business.

Mr. LINDSAY. I think the lowness of this tax is an answer to all the objection. There is no tobacco dealer in the United States who will object to the rate of taxation or to the inequality of it. The fact is that the maximum tax is so low that the question of inequality or uniformity is not worth disputing over.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not agree with the Senator from Kentucky. Anything is worth disputing over that is not right. You are making a rule in this case for the taxation of tobacco that is entirely different from the taxation on any other article. You have measured the amount of taxation in every other schedule of the bill by the value in dollars and cents. You say that a bank with a capital of $25,000 shall pay a license of so much money, and with a capital of $50,000 an amount so much greater. And so with patent medicines; the value of the article is what you have taxed. Now when you come to tobacco, the rule is changed.

The Senator from Kentucky thinks this is a small tax. It is a great tax upon small dealers. It is an unequal tax and an unjust tax. Take the State of Maryland, with the heavy tobacco which we have here as well as in Virginia. It is that tobacco which is dealt with in the leaf. The French and other governments are supplied directly. There is no other class of tobacco that will supply the demand. The average price in the last four years for that tobacco has been less than 6 cents a pound. You tax it 12 cents, and then tax the dealer his license, and ascertain the amount of license he has to pay by the number of pounds he sells.

You go over to New York or Philadelphia or the city of Baltimore, where they deal in lighter grades from Connecticut and Pennsylvania, and bring in tobacco from Sumatra. One pound of Sumatra tobacco will be worth forty times the amount of 1 pound of American tobacco, and yet you rate the tax of the man who has this valuable article by the pound and not by the value. It is unjust. It is the first time it has been introduced here. As was said a moment ago, it would work a hardship and make an inequality in this bill. It is a matter too small, it seems to me, for the Committee on Finance to contend for. It is the first time that it has been attempted to be introduced, and it can not be urged by others than the dealers in the very high class of tobacco as a discrimination against the smaller dealers.

As bad as a revenue bill always must be and as unequal as this bill is in many of its particulars, I do trust that upon this agricultural product that you have taxed greater than any other one item in the bill you will at all events refrain from imposing this great inequality and inflicting this injustice. The amount is small, but it would inure to the benefit of the dealers in the high grades. I will not say it will fill their coffers, but it will add to the revenue of the dealers in a high-class article. Now, at least on this one agricultural article that you are proposing to tax so heavily let us have the same rule of ascertainment that we have on banks and everything else.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator wholly mistakes the character of this tax of 12 cents a pound upon tobacco. We do not tax the Maryland farmer or the Virginia farmer on his tobacco, nor is this a tax upon his tobacco. This is in the nature of a special license tax upon the man who buys the tobacco.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator knows very well that I understand that perfectly. I am dealing with two branches of the subject, however.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand; but I am stating that as preliminary to the statement of the Senator from Maryland, who seems to think we are taxing an agricultural product.

Mr. GORMAN. You are.

Mr. ALLISON. This is not taxing an agricultural product, and there is no provision of this bill that I know of which taxes an agricultural product. It is possible there may be, but I do not know of any such provision. We tax the manufactured tobacco. I have it from the very highest authority and experience that under high taxes, as compared with low taxes, those who grow leaf tobacco receive a higher price for the tobacco than they do when there is no tax upon it. The grower of leaf tobacco in the United States has the world for his market. A very large portion of the tobacco which is grown in the United States is exported; quite a large amount of it is exported to Great Britain, where it pays 80 cents a pound and not 12 cents as under our tax laws.

It is also exported to France, where there is a tobacco monopoly which exacts more than $2 a pound from the consumers of tobacco in that country. So there is no tax here upon the agriculture of Maryland or the agriculture of Virginia or of Kentucky. The tobacco grower is no more interested in this tax than is the wheat grower; he loses nothing either by this indirect method of taxation upon the dealers in leaf tobacco or upon the manufacturers of tobacco.

So, for one, Mr. President, I discard absolutely the idea that here is a tax upon any one person who is interested in the growth of tobacco. It is as much a tax upon a business as is the tax we impose upon any other business. So I trust my friend from Maryland will not think for a moment that we are imposing taxes here in an unjust way upon dealers, even in Maryland, if there are any such there.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator, who is very familiar with this subject, if this is not a tax upon agricultural products? Take the heavy leaf tobacco, which the United States furnishes to Germany and to France in competition now with the balance of the world, who in the end pays this license tax on the manufactured tobacco? Does it not come out of the tobacco in some form which is sent hence?

Mr. ALLISON. We do not send manufactured tobacco to Germany, or, if we do, it must be a very small quantity. We send leaf tobacco, the product of the farmer, to Germany, and we simply tax the dealer in leaf tobacco here $6 on each 50,000 pounds he purchases.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to call his attention to lines 14 and 15, on page 12, which read:

Every person whose business it is to sell, or offer for sale, manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars shall be regarded as a dealer in tobacco.

That does not include men who sell agricultural products which come from the farm, but it includes the dealers in manufactured tobacco.

Mr. DANIEL. And dealers in leaf tobacco also.

Mr. ALLISON. That is another provision. But here is a provision preceding that, providing for a license tax or a special tax on dealers in leaf tobacco.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes, I see.

Mr. ALLISON. This is the first time in the history of internal taxation that I have heard that this small license tax of $6 per annum upon a purchase of 50,000 pounds of tobacco is a tax upon the user of tobacco. I am not very familiar with arithmetic, but I should like to have $6 divided into 50,000 pounds and see how much it is possible to charge up to the producer of tobacco with a license tax of $6.

Mr. GORMAN. Charge it to the aggregate and see what it amounts to.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator asked me while I had the floor how much tobacco was ordinarily worth. I said about 10 cents a pound; but I then had in mind the better grades of tobacco. A great deal of the ordinary grades of tobacco sells for two or three dollars per hundred pounds; the average would be probably from six to ten dollars, and those persons who deal in the coarser grades of tobacco would have to pay just as much as those who deal in the higher grades. That does not seem to be equitable and just.

Mr. LINDSAY. The Senator from Maryland says this is the only instance in which we fail to rate this character of taxation by the value of the product. This is a tax on the dealer in leaf tobacco. Therefore the Senator says, and I think correctly, that it is an indirect tax on the producer. But we levy 12 cents a pound on the manufacturer of any character of tobacco and without any regard whatever to its value. If we intend to tax the manufacturer without regard to value, and to levy a most onerous and oppressive tax, such as 12 cents a pound is, I still insist that the lowness of this tax to be levied upon the dealer brings the matter down not to a matter of insignificance, because wrong is never insignificant, but it is so much fairer, so much more equitable, so much juster than the tax to which I have just called attention, to which there seems to be a universal assent, that I see no reason why the time of the Senate should be taken up in the discussion of it.

Mr. GRAY. Does not the statement, then, of the Senator from Iowa come down to this, that whatever inequality there may be produced by levying a uniform tax, levying a license tax in proportion to the pounds sold, it is more than compensated for—that would be very small at best—by the convenience in administration?

Mr. ALLISON. That is what is said for it by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and all the experts in his Bureau. I do not know whether they have knowledge of this subject to a sufficient extent to advise us to do this thing. It did not originate in the Committee on Finance. If it had done so, it might be subject to severe criticism; but it comes from the people who know most about it and who have to deal with it. The criticism which has been made on the floor is the first criticism I have heard as to the amendment. I agree that the method proposed is a new one; but if it is a better method than the old one, why should we oppose it?

Mr. BUTLER. I have been sitting here patiently waiting to hear some good reason for making the change which is proposed, and the only reason I have heard suggested is the one stated by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] that, if adopted, it would be easier to administer the law under it. That may be so, but whether that is sufficient ground for a change which will discriminate against and increase the tax on the dealers in low-grade tobacco is a serious question.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that as to men who deal in tobacco which sells at 2 cents a pound, as a great deal of it does, the effect of this change is to raise their license tax from $6 to $30 on sales of $5,000. So the effect of the amendment is to increase the tax on dealers in low-grade tobacco, while making a reduction in tax on dealers in high-grade tobacco. There can be no good reason for such discrimination and injustice.

It seems to me that the bill as it stood before the amendment was proposed is certainly fair and will certainly raise as much revenue, and certainly more equitably, than if we make the proposed change. Unless there is something very great to be gained, in some way not explained by the change, it is certainly unfair and unjustifiable to make it.

A great deal of the tobacco produced in my State is of a low grade. The dealer in tobacco who knows that he must pay this tax must certainly make a difference in the price he pays for the tobacco. We all know that the farmer must take any price which is offered to him. So, instead of the farmer having $6 taken off the price of tobacco, the dealer will be certain to make a deduction of twice $6 or three times $6. All these taxes come from the producer. The man who makes the tobacco and the man who uses it are those who pay it. There is no question about that.

If we are to lay a tax on the dealers, let us distribute it fairly, and let those who deal in the high-grade tobacco pay their fair share.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] on behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Iowa. Under the present law, as I understand it, the man who raises leaf tobacco can, without paying any tax, sell it to anyone who wishes to purchase it. I wish to ask if there is any restriction or change in that regard in this bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not the slightest.

Mr. BERRY. No change at all?

Mr. ALDRICH. None whatever.

Mr. BERRY. The man who raises leaf tobacco can still sell it as under the present law?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. It will be the same as under the present law. We do not put any restrictions upon its sale.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 12, after line 8, to strike out the following clause:

Dealers in tobacco whose annual sales do not exceed $10,000 shall each pay $4.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I propose an amendment making a change in lines 12 and 13, on page 12.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12 it is proposed to amend lines 12 and 13, so that they will read as follows:

Dealers in tobacco whose annual sales shall exceed 50,000 pounds shall each pay $12.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Beginning in line 20, on page 12, I propose a modification of the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12 it is proposed to modify amendments numbered 25 and 26 so that the two paragraphs, if amended, will read from line 20 to line 24, inclusive, as follows:

Manufacturers of tobacco whose annual sales shall not exceed 50,000 pounds shall each pay $6.

Manufacturers of tobacco whose annual sales shall exceed 50,000 pounds and shall not exceed 100,000 pounds shall each pay $12.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 13 I offer the substitute which I send to the desk for amendments numbered 27, 28, 29, and 30.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify lines 1 to 9, inclusive, on page 13, so as to read as follows:

Manufacturers of tobacco whose annual sales shall exceed 100,000 pounds shall each pay $24.

Manufacturers of cigars whose annual sales shall not exceed 100,000 cigars shall each pay $6.

Manufacturers of cigars whose annual sales shall exceed 100,000 and shall not exceed 200,000 cigars shall each pay $12.

Manufacturers of cigars whose annual sales shall exceed 200,000 cigars shall each pay $24.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 13, after line 9, to strike out:

Peddlers of tobacco shall be classified and rated as follows, to wit: When traveling with more than two horses, mules, or other animals, as of the first class, and shall pay $48; when traveling with two horses, mules, or other animals, as of the second class, and shall pay $24; when traveling with one horse, mule, or other animal, as of the third class, and shall pay $12; when traveling on foot or by public conveyance or by private conveyance other than hereby described, as of the fourth class, and shall pay $7.50. Any person who sells or offers to sell and deliver manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, or cigarettes, traveling from place to place, in the town or through the country shall be regarded as a peddler of tobacco.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 25, after the word "this," to strike out "section" and insert "act;" after the word "tax" and at the end of line 2, on page 14, to strike out "be fined not less than $10 nor more than $500" and insert "be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars, or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court;" so as to make the clause read:

And every person who carries on any business or occupation for which special taxes are imposed by this act, without having paid the special tax herein provided, shall, besides being liable to the payment of such special tax, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars, or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the amendment just adopted, to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. —. Until appropriate stamps are prepared and furnished, the stamps heretofore used to denote the payment of the internal-revenue tax on fermented liquors, tobacco, snuff, cigars, and cigarettes may be stamped or imprinted with a suitable device to denote the new rate of tax, and shall be affixed to all packages containing such articles on which the tax imposed by this act is paid. And any person having possession of unaffixed stamps heretofore issued for the payment of the tax upon fermented liquors, tobacco, snuff, cigars, or cigarettes, shall present the same to the collector of the district, who shall receive them at the price paid for such stamps by the purchasers and issue in lieu thereof new or imprinted stamps at the rate provided by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 14, line 28, I move to strike out the word "first" and the word "June;" so as to leave the date blank when the adhesive-stamp tax shall take effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to offer and have pending an amendment? On page 15, after line 18, I desire to offer an amendment and have it pending.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let it be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator, if it will not inconvenience him, to allow that to be passed over for the present until all of the committee amendments shall have been disposed of. I think that course will be more convenient.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Nebraska wants to have the amendment printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be printed, in the absence of objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not hear the suggestion of the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I understood the Senator from Iowa to offer an amendment applying to the tax on drugs and patented articles.

Mr. ALDRICH. We have not come to that yet.

Mr. ALLEN. We have passed that.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. FAULKNER. We shall not come to that for some time yet.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out section 11, beginning with line 23, on page 22.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, beginning with line 23, it is proposed to strike out the following:

SEC. 11. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized to prescribe such methods for the cancellation of stamps, as substitute for or in addition to the method now prescribed by law, as he may deem expedient and effectual.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state that that is already provided for in section 24, so that it is a mere duplication.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 28, line 30, in section 19, I move to strike out the words "first" and "June;" so as to leave the time for the taking effect of the section blank.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. In line 11, on page 28, there is a proviso which reads:

That official messages of the several Departments of the Government shall be exempt from the taxes herein imposed upon telegraphic and telephonic messages.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not quite sure that the phraseology used would include Congress, but it ought to, and I am willing to insert apt words for that purpose. I believe it was the understanding of the committee, though I only speak for myself, that, as to official messages of the several Departments of the Government, they were to be excluded if we exclude the official messages of Congress. The Senator from Massachusetts thinks we should add there the words "or of Congress."

Mr. LODGE. Yes; so as to read:

That official messages of Congress and of the several Departments of the Government shall be exempt, etc.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I take it that the inquiry can only be directed as to local messages here in Washington. If members of Congress send messages by the Western Union Telegraph wires, they ought to put a cent stamp upon them.

Mr. ALDRICH. This does not apply to personal messages, but to official messages.

Mr. ALLISON. As the Senator from Rhode Island has said, these are not personal but official messages. We have official messages here in the Senate, I am told.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If Senators and Representatives send messages by the Western Union wires, they ought to put a cent stamp upon each message.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator should desire to send a telegram to the Treasury Department on official business, does he think he should put a stamp upon it?

Mr. WOLCOTT. That would not go by the Western Union

Telegraph. If it is an official message, under the phraseology of the proviso Congress would be included.

Mr. ALLISON. That was the question the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was asking.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The phraseology is, "official messages of the several Departments of the Government." The legislative department is certainly one of the departments of the Government.

Mr. LODGE. Then what objection is there to saying so, if that is what is meant?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think we have said so.

Mr. ALLISON. We thought we had, but there seems to be some doubt about it, and I want to make it certain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, line 11, after the words "messages of," it is proposed to insert "Congress and the;" so as to read:

Provided further, That official messages of Congress and of the several Departments of the Government shall be exempt from the taxes herein imposed upon telegraphic and telephonic messages.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That would leave us in the anomalous condition of stating officially on a revenue bill that Congress is not one of the departments of the Government.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that Congress is one of the departments of the Government.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have been always under the impression that this was the legislative department of the Government, and clearly it comes within the provision of the exemption.

Mr. ALLISON. We have the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government.

Mr. FORAKER. But an official message from a member of Congress would not be from the legislative department itself. That is the only point, as I understand, which the Senator from Massachusetts has made.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Neither is any particular officer in the Interior or the Treasury Department a department himself. Some think they are, but they are not. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. But if there comes from one of the Executive Departments an inquiry of a Senator, does the Senator think that the answer to that inquiry, being on official business, should be stamped?

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that if the language adopted should be such as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts it would cover messages from individual members of Congress?

Mr. LODGE. That is, official messages?

Mr. HALE. Of course.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. I thought that was the point the Senator from Massachusetts made.

Mr. HALE. I should doubt very much whether such messages would be included.

Mr. LODGE. The only point I desired to make was as to official messages of Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, the insertion of the words "members of the several departments of the Government" will make it very clear and undoubted.

Mr. HALE. That would do it, but I do not know whether, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado, the committee wants to do that.

Mr. ALDRICH. Official messages.

Mr. TILLMAN. We want to know what the committee desires to do.

Mr. HALE. Messages upon official business of members of Congress are an entirely distinct thing from messages of Congress itself. They are the messages upon official business of the members of the Senate and the House. That is different.

Mr. ALDRICH. The suggestion made by the Senator from South Carolina and the amendment now suggested can be both adopted.

Mr. HALE. The amendment suggested by the Senator from South Carolina covers it, if the committee wants to do that.

Mr. ALDRICH. "Messages on official business of members of the several departments."

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator want to put that into the bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; I do. I think that is what the committee intended originally, that messages upon official business should not be required to pay a tax.

Mr. HALE. Sent by members of the two Houses of Congress?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. For instance, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate or the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House may notify Senators or Members to return here for a vote. He sends such messages as official messages, at Government rates, just as all the Departments do.

Mr. HALE. That is a message from the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I know.

Mr. HALE. That is not by an individual member.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it is exempted by this proviso.

Mr. HALE. Are we to go into that wider domain suggested by the Senator from South Carolina and except individual members of Congress?

Mr. LODGE. Why not, if the messages are on official business?

Mr. HALE. Does the committee want to do that?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, in framing this amendment the committee took great care, the tax being so slight and so light, that there should be as few exceptions as possible. They excepted from the operation of the bill messages used by railroads along the line of the road operated by the railroad company, where their agents were the operators upon the line and where they acted, as well, as agents for the telegraph companies. But they excluded messages sent by railroad officials from one line to another line. They struck out a proposition in the bill as it came from the House that messages on a pass should not pay a stamp. It seemed to the committee that if there was a war to be paid for, the man who had the courtesies of a pass ought at least to be willing to pay a cent upon the message as against the man who has to pay a dollar to send the same message.

If we make the exception that telegrams of members of either House on official business shall be exempt, make that special exception, we leave it open to the greatest possible misconception by the people and the greatest possible misconception by the officers of the telegraph companies who are charged with seeing that the stamp is put upon a message before they receive it for transmission. What is to prevent my handing in a telegram at a window here, and the operator says, "There is no stamp on it." I say, "No; but this is about a post-office at Tincup, where there is a vacancy, and it does not need a stamp;" or, "I am sending this at the Government rate," and so the Government does not get its stamp out of this inquiry made as to the post-office. The exception in the act is broad enough to cover the ordinary official messages between Departments, including the Congressional department.

As to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], I will say we never get a telegram here signed "Treasury Department." We get a telegram from the Secretary or the Auditor or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and if we send between the Departments messages, they are clearly to my mind excepted. But if we once put in the loophole and say that telegrams of members of Congress need not pay the cent tax, members will not put very many stamps on their messages.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator will allow me. I did not say anything about official messages of Congress. What I said was "members of Congress, in regard to official business."

Mr. WOLCOTT. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. I thought the Senator did. The objection the Senator from Colorado makes it seems to me is not well taken. We are now authorized to send messages, when they are in regard to public business, at Government rates, and every time a member of Congress sends such a message he so denotes it on the message. He is put upon his honor about it, and so he would be in respect to this tax. In every case in which he is authorized to use a Government pass he is authorized also, if the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts should be adopted, to decline to put a stamp upon it. So it comes to the same thing at last.

I see no reason why members of Congress sending messages on public business, in which they have no personal interest, should not be exempt from the tax. Personally I do not care anything about it. I supposed the sentiment generally was, as I understood it to be expressed by the Senator from Iowa, that he would be willing to have the bill so amended as to exempt from taxation messages of that character.

To-day I have sent quite a number of messages, some of them upon public business, some upon private business, some of a social character. Some use the Government pass, some use the social stamp, if you have it and see fit to use it, and some I have to pay for. Every day I suppose that is the experience of every other Senator, that he has to determine these matters.

Mr. TILLMAN. For the last three weeks I have been an errand boy, going to the War and Navy Departments in relation to military matters connected with the volunteers, and I have sent out possibly thirty, forty, or fifty telegrams on the Senate telegraph paper which you all know something about. Under the rules we have to sign those in the corner "Official business," with a certain number and letter, and then say "U. S. S.," signifying that it is official. If telegrams of that class are understood to be included in the bill, there is no need of the amendment, but as a matter of English I do not believe it. This is a branch of the Government, not a legislative department. It is the great legislative branch of the Government. Of course I may be accused of quibbling in making this distinction between "branch" and "department."

Mr. GRAY. The individual members are not the department.
Mr. TILLMAN. Of course not. If you have a telegram from the War Department, you expect the Secretary of War to sign it, and nobody else has the authority. If we say the members of the legislative department, or the legislative branch, shall have their telegrams sent and not have to pay the tax, we will understand it. Otherwise, it will be just simply our forcing it by putting upon the language our own construction, which it will not bear.

Mr. ALLISON. I move an amendment on page 29—
Mr. LODGE. What became of the amendment I offered?
Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator did not offer any.
Mr. LODGE. Yes, I did. I moved to insert "Congress."
The SECRETARY. After the word "of," in line 11, page 28, it is proposed to insert "Congress and of."

Mr. LODGE. "Official messages of members of Congress."
Mr. ALLISON. I am not quite sure we ought to go to the extent of saying "official messages of members of Congress." Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow his amendment to lie over?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I will withdraw it. It only seems to me that we ought to have one rule. If we are going to exempt the messages sent by anybody in the Departments, and that is what this bill provides now, then messages sent officially by members of either House or by the officers of either body ought to have the same exemption.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There is an exception, if it can be framed in the amendment, to which there can be no objection. That is to say, that messages for which the Government of the United States pays the tariff shall not require a stamp. That is all right. Where the Government of the United States pays for the message it need not have a stamp.

Mr. LODGE. That is all right.
Mr. WOLCOTT. But if we are going to let members of Congress or anybody else determine whether they will put on a stamp, this section will be subject to abuse.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. ALLISON. Before it passes from the consideration of the Senate, I will say that these official messages that are paid for under the rules and regulations established by the Post-Office Department are very carefully scrutinized by the accounting officers of the Department, and they only apply to matters of business and do not include social or personal messages.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment heretofore offered by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 23, after the word "surgeon," which has already been inserted as a committee amendment, it is proposed to insert "or which may be put up or compounded for said person by a druggist or pharmacist selling at retail only."

Mr. ALLISON. The words "or surgeon" were inserted in line 22, after the word "physician," and these words are to follow the words thus inserted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the amendment in brackets be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lines 23, 28, and 24, page 29, it is proposed to strike out the words "but nothing in this act shall be construed to exempt from said tax any" and insert "and the provisions of this act shall include all."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope the Senator from Iowa will allow the amendment to go over until to-morrow. I was not satisfied with it in committee, and I am not yet. I desire further time to look into it.

Mr. ALLISON. The one just now read?
Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Amendment 66.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be laid over.

Mr. ALLISON. It may be passed over. I hope it will be printed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I want to look a little further at the amendment. I am not quite satisfied with it. I have no objection to striking out the word "proprietary" and leaving the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. GRAY. Why strike it out? I do not understand the reason for it. That is a paragraph which attempts emphatically to keep under the provisions of the taxing law all medicinal articles which shall be in any manner similar to patent or proprietary medicines, put up in that style, etc.

Mr. ALLISON. "Or which have on their labels or wrappers recommendations as remedies or specifics for any ailment, or as having any special proprietary claims to merit." In line 4 is where the committee intend to strike out the word "proprietary."

Mr. GRAY. Oh.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. My reason for wanting it stricken out is because I think it makes the provision very much broader.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will ask the Senator from Iowa whether striking out the word does not make any medicine or compound prepared by a druggist, if he claims merit for it in reference to any healing quality, subject to tax, and yet he has no proprietary ownership in it?

Mr. ALLISON. We have just exempted by an amendment which was inserted all articles put up or compounded by a druggist for his retail trade.

Mr. FAULKNER. Very well.
Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out the word "proprietary," in line 4, page 30, and the letter "s" at the end of the word "claims," in the same line.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, page 30, it is proposed to strike out the word "proprietary," before the word "claims," and to strike out the word "claims" and insert "claim."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wish amendment 66 to remain open.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is no objection to the word being stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Finance report an amendment, No. 70, page 31, to strike out in line 12 the words "subject to a penalty of $100" and insert "deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court."

Mr. ALDRICH. In line 14, after the word "not," strike out "less than one hundred nor."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I thought that was done.

Mr. FAULKNER. What is the amendment?

Mr. ALDRICH. It simply removes the minimum.

Mr. FAULKNER. Let it be stated.

The SECRETARY. If amended, it will read:

Shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not more than $500 or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. HALE. What is proposed to be done about this penalty?

Mr. ALLISON. It is proposed to strike out the minimum; the words "not less than $100."

Mr. HALE. It is left discretionary with the court to impose a smaller penalty?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I think that is right.

Mr. ALLISON. It takes off the limit.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 38, after line 15, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That internal-revenue stamps required by existing law on imported merchandise shall be affixed thereto and canceled at the expense of the owner or importer while such merchandise is in the custody of the proper custom-house officer and before withdrawal for consumption, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the affixing of such stamps not inconsistent herewith.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I will add "and canceling," although I think that is provided for.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. In the third line of page 38 "15th day of June" should be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done, leaving it blank.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out, in line 14, page 34, "1st day of June," so as to leave it blank.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe all the amendments have been agreed to up to page 37. On page 37, line 18, after the word "and," I move to insert "from and after the 1st day of July, 1898."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 19, before the word "money," I move to insert "original domestic."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 40, line 25, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "by rail or water or by both rail and water" and the comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. This paragraph has been amended. I ask that it may be acted on now.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to line 3, page 41. There was a proposition to strike out the word "receipt."

Mr. ALLISON. It was stricken out.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I did not so understand.

Mr. ALLISON. It was also stricken out in lines 8, 10, and 14. In line 11, after the word "company," has the word "steamboat" been inserted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendment may be disposed of. That is the amendment which the Senator from Maryland desires to have passed over?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let it be passed over.

Mr. GORMAN. That is the amendment. I now offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for all from line 22, on page 40, down to and including line 14, on page 42.

The SECRETARY. Beginning with line 22, on page 40, strike out all of the bill down to and including line 14, on page 42, and insert—

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Iowa if the word "any" was stricken out on the top of page 43 and "each" inserted?

Mr. ALLISON. We have not reached that yet. Is it the wish of the Senator from Maryland to have a vote now upon his amendment?

Mr. GORMAN. I should like very much to have it now. I should be glad to have a vote. I want to get on with the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think the Senator from Iowa had better first amend the proposition proposed to be stricken out and put in the word "each" where "any" occurs in line 1, page 42. It can be done by unanimous consent.

The SECRETARY. In line 1, page 42, strike out "any" and insert "each."

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator from Arkansas. I did not understand his proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment just stated will be agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Now, the Senator from Maryland can offer his amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland proposes a substitute which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Beginning on line 22, page 40, strike out all of the bill down to and including line 14, on page 42, and insert:

That from and after the passage of this act every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing or having the care or management of any railroad, street railroad, sleeping car, steamboat, ship, or other vessel, engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or freight for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, or carrying on or doing an express business, or having the care or management of any telegraphic or telephone line by which telegraphic or telephone dispatches or messages are received or transmitted, or carrying on or doing the business of furnishing gas or electric light, electric power, steam heat, or steam power, or refining petroleum, or refining sugar, or owning or controlling any pipe line for transporting oil or other products, whose gross annual receipts exceed $250,000, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax equivalent to one-fourth of 1 per cent on the gross amount of all receipts of such persons, firms, corporations, and companies in their respective business in excess of said sum of $250,000. Provided, That the assessment hereby made shall not include any amount for the receipts for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails between the United States and any foreign port; but such tax shall be rated for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails from a port within the United States through a foreign territory to a port within the United States, and shall be assessed upon and collected from persons, firms, companies, or corporations within the United States receiving hire or pay for such transportation of persons, freight, or mails.

And a true and accurate return of the amount of gross receipts as aforesaid shall be made and rendered monthly by each of such associations, corporations, companies, or persons to the collector of the district in which any such association, corporation, or company may be located, or in which such person has his place of business. Such return shall be verified under oath by the person making the same, or, in case of corporations, by the president or chief officer thereof. Any person failing or refusing to make return as aforesaid, or who shall make a false or fraudulent return, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000 for each failure or refusal to make return as aforesaid and for each and every false or fraudulent return.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I do not believe that this amendment in its present form will accomplish the purpose of collecting much, if any, tax from the corporations. It provides that all their receipts to the amount of $250,000 shall be exempt from taxation. Many of the large corporations are composed in reality of a great number of smaller corporations. Some of them are simply a combination of perhaps a hundred or two hundred corporations, and the receipts of the great organization are distributed among the minor corporations from the books of the company. The consequence is that the amount of tax that will be collected under this provision will, in my opinion, be exceedingly small. Some of the great railroad organizations of the country are made up of pieces of lines 60, 100, 10, 2, and 1 mile in length, and upon their books a separate account is kept with each corporation. I know one of the great systems of this country that in my opinion is divided up into a hundred corporations, and under this proposed act $250,000 will be deducted, and it will exempt from taxation every one of them.

What is more, Mr. President, this tax is $2,500 on every million dollars of their receipts. All they have to do if a company receives a million dollars is to create four companies, and then it is merely a matter of bookkeeping, and they pay no tax at all. So the amendment, in my opinion, is simply a delusion and will result in no revenue. I do not believe you will get as much out of it if you adopt it as you will get out of the provision of the bill as it now stands, as reported by the committee. The stamp on vouchers, waybills, etc., will, in my opinion, bring more revenue than this will bring.

The amendment has been made immeasurably worse by decreasing the amount from one-half of 1 per cent to one-fourth of 1 per cent, and it is made immeasurably worse than when first offered by the Senator from Maryland by inserting the exemption clause as to all these corporations. Therefore I shall vote for the amendment in its present form. I shall not vote for the amendment which strikes out the provision placed in the bill, presented as it is in such a form that it will be impossible to secure a vote upon an amendment to it which would make it acceptable.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from South Dakota permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator see that in refusing to vote for the amendment in its present form the Senator is cooperating with those who are opposed to this tax in any form?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not at all; for I shall offer the amendment at another place in the bill, and offer it without the objectionable features against which I protest. I am deprived now of the opportunity of offering my amendment so that I can vote for it, because my amendment, if offered to this amendment, would be in the third degree. Therefore I shall vote against it, and then I shall offer an amendment which will tax all these corporations on their total receipts and make the tax one-quarter of 1 per cent, perhaps one-half of 1 per cent.

This is the only feature of the bill that is not a tax upon consumption, a per capita tax. It is the only feature of the bill where we can reach the great combinations of wealth in this country. I wish to have it so that I can reach those combinations of wealth and not be trapped into voting for an amendment which pretends to reach them and does not do it, and that is what this amendment does. I take it for granted that the Senator from Maryland in presenting it in this form and in this way was not aware of the fact that little would come of it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to one fact. I think the character of his amendment is such that he ought to include in the portion stricken out also section 17, on page 27, relating to telegraph messages. In this amendment you include, as I understand it, gross earnings on railroads, transportation companies, telephone companies, telegraph companies, sugar-refining and oil-refining companies. If you include telegraph companies and make them pay a gross-earning tax, you ought to relieve them from the stamp tax, as you propose to do in the case of railroads. That would make the amendment entirely consistent. I make that suggestion to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to call his attention to the fact that the telegraph companies in the message tax are not taxed at all? The tax is on the sender of the message and not on the company. The bill has been very skillfully drawn with a view to exempting corporations of all kinds and large amounts of wealth from taxation. It puts a tax on the sender of the message, not upon the company.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. I do not see him in his seat, and will withhold my vote. If I could vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER (when Mr. HEITFELD's name was called). The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEITFELD] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] by a special arrangement between the two Senators for the afternoon.

Mr. FAULKNER. I did not know of that arrangement. The Senator from West Virginia did not make that statement to me.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from West Virginia came to me and asked me to announce the pair.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] just before he left desired me to announce that he is in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], and withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Florida that we exchange our pairs. I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. That will enable us both to vote.

Mr. MALLORY. That is agreeable to me. I vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who is absent, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. PLATT of New York (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. I am informed that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEITFIELD] is absent without a pair, and I therefore transfer my pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEITFIELD] and vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who is absent, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). On this question, at the request of the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], I am paired with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I will transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON], who is absent, unpaired. Therefore, the Senator from Georgia will stand paired with the Senator from Illinois, and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON. My colleague [Mr. CLAY] is absent from the city by reason of sickness in his family. If he were present, he would vote "yea." I am so authorized to state.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I understand that I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON], and for that reason I shall not vote. If he had been present, I should have voted "yea."

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I was requested by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] to announce his pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. The Senator from Oregon is absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON]. If he were present, he would vote "nay." I transfer my pair to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who, if present, would vote "yea," I understand, and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HANNA. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS]. I desire to transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]. I vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the negative). The senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] informs me that he does not think his colleague [Mr. CLAY] would like to have me transfer his pair. Therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the arrangement made a moment ago, the pair of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] was to be transferred to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. The Senator from Vermont has since appeared in the Senate Chamber and voted. I now suggest to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN], as I stand paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] and he with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON], that we transfer our pairs, and that will allow us both to vote, if agreeable to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. I vote "nay."

Mr. SULLIVAN. I vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE. According to the transfer announced by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA], I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 34; as follows:

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer what I send to the desk as an additional amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 49, after line 14, it is proposed to insert:

That from and after the passage of this act every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing or having the care or management of any railroad, street railroad, sleeping car, steamboat, ship, or other vessel, engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or freight for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, or carrying on or doing an express business, or having the care or management of any telegraphic or telephone line by which telegraphic or telephone dispatches or messages are received or transmitted, or carrying on or doing the business of furnishing gas or electric light, electric power, steam heat, or steam power, or refining petroleum, or refining sugar, or owning or controlling any pipe line for transporting oil or other products, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax equivalent to one-half of 1 per cent on the gross amount of all receipts of such persons, firms, corporations, and companies in their respective business: Provided, That the assessment hereby made shall not include any amount for the receipts for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails between the United States and any foreign port; but such tax shall be rated for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails from a port within the United States through a foreign territory to a port within the United States, and shall be assessed upon and collected from persons, firms, companies, or corporations within the United States receiving hire or pay for such transportation of persons, freight, or mails.

And a true and accurate return of the amount of gross receipts as aforesaid shall be made and rendered monthly by each of such associations, corporations, companies, or persons to the collector of the district in which any such association, corporation, or company may be located, or in which such person has his place of business. Such return shall be verified under oath by the person making the same, or, in case of corporations, by the president or chief officer thereof. Any person failing or refusing to make return as aforesaid, or who shall make a false or fraudulent return, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000 for each and every false or fraudulent return.

Mr. PETTIGREW. As I understand it, the amendment which I now offer is the same as the amendment offered last week by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], with the exemption stricken out, so that the tax on gross receipts of these corporations shall be one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Is it proposed as a substitute?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not propose it as a substitute, but as an additional section.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to inquire of the Senator if it is proposed to put this tax upon these corporations in addition to the stamp tax?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is an additional tax?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then it certainly ought not to be adopted.

Mr. MANTLE. In view of what the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] has just said, I move to amend in line 5, on page 2, of the amendment, by reducing the amount from one-half to one-fourth.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The original amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota is subject to amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly; I suppose it is subject to amendment. It is not a motion to strike out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE] to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment on page 2, line 5, after the word "one," where it first occurs, by striking out "half" and inserting "fourth," so as to read:

Shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax equivalent to one-fourth of 1 per cent on the gross amount of all receipts of such persons, firms, corporations, and companies in their respective business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], but will suggest to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN] that we transfer our pairs, and that will enable us both to vote. So the Senator from Texas will stand paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON]. I vote "nay."

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I desire to state that I make the same exchange of pairs on this vote as on the previous vote, which will enable the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIN] and myself to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KYLE (when his name was called). I should like to ask if the proposition is a substitute for the pending amendment or in addition to it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is an additional amendment.

Mr. KYLE. Is it an additional tax?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes.

Mr. KYLE. Then I vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAIRBANKS (when Mr. McBRIDE's name was called). I am requested to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McBRIDE] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. The Senator from Oregon is unavoidably absent. He would vote "nay" on this question if present.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], but under the exchange of pairs heretofore announced by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], who was paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON], I am at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER. That amounts to both the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and I transferring our pairs, so that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] stands paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON].

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. PLATT of New York (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I again announce that I transfer my pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEITFELD]; and I vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). With the transfer of pairs announced by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA], I am at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PASCO. I was requested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] to give notice that he is paired on these questions with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McBRIDE].

Mr. ALDRICH. I was requested by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to state that on all questions pertaining to this bill he is paired for this afternoon with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. BACON. I again announce that my colleague [Mr. CLAY] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 36; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to offer an amendment, which I ask may take the place of amendment No. 177 of the bill. The object of it is, briefly, to impose an excise tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent upon the business of oil refining and sugar refining, so that the Standard Oil and the sugar trusts will be able to pay taxes under the bill, which under the present status, without this amendment, is somewhat doubtful.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the committee amendment No. 177, on page 50, it is proposed to insert the following:

Every person carrying on or doing the business of refining petroleum, or refining sugar, or owning or controlling any pipe line for transporting oil or other products, whose gross annual receipts exceed $250,000, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax equivalent to one-quarter of 1 per cent on the gross amount of all receipts of such persons, firms, corporations, and companies in their respective business in excess of said sum of $250,000.

And a true and accurate return of the amount of gross receipts as aforesaid shall be made and rendered monthly by each of such associations, corporations, companies, or persons to the collector of the district in which any such association, corporation, or company may be located, or in which such person has his place of business. Such return shall be verified under oath by the person making the same, or, in case of corporations, by the president or chief officer thereof. Any person failing or refusing to make return as aforesaid, or who shall make a false or fraudulent return, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000 for each failure or refusal to make return as aforesaid and for each and every false or fraudulent return.

Mr. DANIEL. I wish to say a word about this tax. The great distress amongst the corporations of the country and the wealthy men, which has led them to deprecate being called on to participate in the war with Spain, is relieved to a certain extent by the condition of the Standard Oil Company. I am sure the Senate will receive with satisfaction the information that their certificates are now at the very highest rate they have ever been. It is announced in the papers this morning that yesterday they touched the highest point in their history, being worth 449. I do not think they will be put in the poorhouse by contributing a portion, a small fraction of 1 per cent, to the Government, participating in the advantages of which they have so enriched themselves.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I desire to say in a word why I propose to vote against this amendment. If it were not that a prejudice exists against two corporations, the Standard Oil Company and the American Sugar Refining Company, I think no Senator would vote for it—not one.

Mr. DANIEL. I will be glad to add any other corporation that the Senator may suggest.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is picking out from all the interests of the country two classes of business where it is absolutely certain that the corporations will not pay the tax, but that it will be paid by the consumer. There is no other business in the country where the corporations or the persons engaged in it can so surely and certainly evade the payment of the tax as in the case of the business of oil refining and sugar refining, and, what is more, the persons engaged in the business will be very careful in raising the price of oil and sugar to raise it a little more than the tax, so that the consumer will pay not only the tax, but the additional profit to these two companies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. BERRY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). Under the arrangement formerly made, pairing the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], and will be pleased to exchange pairs so that the Senator from Mississippi and I can vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). Under the agreement with the Senator from Indiana, I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY]. If he were present, I would vote "nay" and I suppose he would vote "yea."

Mr. McLAURIN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Under the arrangement twice announced I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I was requested by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McBRIDE] to announce that he is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. The Senator from Oregon is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BACON. If my colleague [Mr. CLAY] were present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 26; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment is inserted on page 59, as I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was offered in place of amendment No. 177.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that without further amendment we may vote upon the paragraphs on pages 40, 41, and 42.

Mr. STEWART. What are they?

Mr. ALLISON. They are the stamp taxes.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to offer an amendment at some stage.

Mr. SEWELL. I call the attention of the honorable Senator from Iowa to the statement made by me a few days ago when this subject was under consideration in relation to a double tax proposed on receipts and waybills. In this section we levy a tax of 1 cent upon all manifests or receipts for goods. There is no objection to that; but in another section which was not intended to cover it at all, which is really intended to relieve some interests of the stamp tax—I will read the section.

Mr. MANTLE. What page?

Mr. SEWELL. Page 53, amendment No. 142:

Receipts for the payment of any sum of money, or for the payment of any debt due, not being for the satisfaction of any mortgage or judgment or decree of any court, and not otherwise in this act especially enumerated, 1 cent.

Now, the fact of the case is simply this: If you were to ship a box of goods from here to Baltimore, you would pay 1 cent on the manifest. Prepayments are very seldom made. The party receiving it on the other end, or the railway corporation, would have to stamp the receipt, paying 1 cent at each end. By a careful calculation it is found that the number of waybills in this country in a year approaches nearly 500,000,000. There is no objection to taxing the railroads to that extent, but when you come to add, which is not the intention of the committee at all, 500,000,000 receipts which they have to give for the money, you simply double their taxation.

Mr. CULLOM. That will be $5,000,000.

Mr. SEWELL. Five million dollars on each end.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to interrupt him for a moment? The committee in the consideration of the subject a few days ago unanimously agreed that receipts exceeding $5 only should be taxed, so that the vast majority of waybills would not come under that provision. But I will say further to the Senator that I think some amendment can be reached that will cover the case suggested by him.

Mr. SEWELL. I think it is perfectly proper that the railroad company should pay a fair portion of the tax.

Mr. ALLISON. For myself, if the receipt for the money can be identified as a part of the waybill, as a part of the original transaction, I think it should not bear double taxation; but I do not speak for the committee.

Mr. SEWELL. The tax ought to be put on the receipt for the money.

If you will allow me to suggest an amendment, I will be glad to have the committee agree with me, because I do not think they at any time during the preparation of the bill had any idea that they were going to tax the receipts at one end and the waybills at another. On page 41, line 9, after the word "thereof," this could be covered by inserting "when the service to be performed is prepaid." The other section then covers everything that is receipted for.

Mr. ALDRICH. That will not do.

Mr. ALLISON. I should not like to consent to that amendment. This amendment was very largely considered by a subcommittee of which the Senator from Colorado was the chief.

Mr. SEWELL. I do not care how it is done. I want the principle acknowledged that you are taxing at both ends of the line.

Mr. ALLISON. We will not tax at both ends of the line if we can arrange a proper substitute, but the Senator provides now that the stamp shall not be affixed except in case of prepayment. Of course then there will be no prepayment.

Mr. SEWELL. They must necessarily under the other section put on a stamp for the payment of the money in each case.

Now, I have another suggestion to make about the other section. I offer to amend the other section, if the Senator does not want to have this section amended, although it is the proper place for it, by inserting on page 53, line 1, amendment No. 142—

Mr. ALLISON. That amendment is not under consideration. When we reach it the committee itself proposes an amendment. Besides, I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the committee amendments are to be first considered.

Mr. SEWELL. I should be gratified to know what action the committee will take on this question.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut (to Mr. SEWELL). You can amend the committee amendment.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to insert "when the service to be performed is prepaid."

Mr. ALLISON. I can not agree to that amendment on behalf of the committee. I do not think it is a proper amendment to make, because it seems to me if we adopt that amendment there will be no waybills prepaid, and therefore there will be no stamp tax.

Mr. SEWELL. The stamp tax will be on the receipt.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a very different thing.

Mr. SEWELL. I will offer another amendment and ask to have it printed. If the chairman has no objection, I will read it. It is to the other section. On page 53, amendment 142, line 1, after the words "decree of any court," insert "nor for the payment of charges on goods received for carriage and transportation, bills of lading, manifests, or receipts for which are hereinbefore required to be issued and stamped." Either end of the line I want to have relieved. I ask that the amendment may be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. It may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator whether we have amended this provision so as to exclude from the stamp tax every bill of lading where the consideration is under $5?

Mr. ALLISON. We propose to amend the provision relating to receipts; that receipts for less than $5 need not be stamped. That is on page 53.

Mr. GORMAN. That does not apply to receipts in the case of express companies?

Mr. ALLISON. It does not.

Mr. GORMAN. It does not affect this amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. It has no relation to this amendment.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Iowa says that has no relation to this amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. It does not affect this provision in any way, because the other provision is a receipt for money. This is a receipt for property. This is a bill of lading for property.

Mr. GRAY. That is a bill of lading, a transportation receipt. Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The word "receipt" has been stricken out of this provision in four places.

Mr. ALLISON. The other paragraph under consideration relates to receipts for money and not for property.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I have some general notions in regard to this method of taxation which I did not intend to trouble the Senate with now. I do not know that I shall trouble it with them at all except to allude to them in the briefest possible way.

I voted for the tax on gross receipts in lieu of this whole stamp provision. I do not conceive that there is any more, I will not say odious form of taxation, but any more troublesome, annoying, and irritating form of taxation than this form of excise tax, a general stamp tax. It always has been so. It was the mode of the tax rather than the measure or the amount of the tax which was the principal grievance in our early history and brought about our separation from the mother country.

I do not believe in taxation for the sake of taxation. I do not believe in taxation which is meant to be an attack on classes or interests anywhere, wherever they may exist under the protection of the law. I believe that the great activities of commerce and exchange, the great activities of business and wealth producing, should be as free as possible from the interfering hand of the Government. There may be, it is true, a dire necessity—an extreme condition which will warrant extreme measures of taxation—but I do not believe that we have reached that extreme condition now.

All taxes of this character, however they may be directed at what we call the wealth of the country, in some fashion and in some way sift down to consumption. Every restraint and interference that we make on the great machinery of exchange of commodities, every burden that we place upon exchange and commercial activities, is a blow at the wealth-producing capacity of the country and affects the poorest man more than it does the wealthiest members of the community.

It is a burden on the wealth-producing capacity of the country, and the wealth-producing capacity of a country is the measure of its civilization, of its happiness, and its prosperity. When you throw into this great and intricate machinery some clog, something that interferes with its movement and smooth running, then you interfere to the detriment of all classes and you interfere with the poorest member of the community and detract something from the prosperity of each, and of the humblest member of society. I do not believe, sir, that taxation of that kind, unless justified by extreme necessity, unless compensated for either by the amount of the tax or an absolute exigency, ought to be imposed in this way, and especially at this time.

Now, I do not understand that this levy will produce any very great amount of revenue. I am not sure that it will produce an amount that will compensate for the interference it makes with the great business operations of the country and the machinery by which that business is done. I do not understand that this stamp tax will produce a large sum. I have not heard the Senator who has the bill in charge say how much this stamp tax will produce; and I ask him if it will produce more than $5,000,000 or $6,000,000?

Mr. ALLISON. This particular tax?

Mr. GRAY. This particular tax. Is there any estimate?

Mr. ALLISON. On corporations and railroads I think it would produce probably six or seven million dollars.

Mr. GRAY. I do not think that a tax of that kind, proposing to raise that amount, is sufficient compensation for the interference it will make and the annoyance it will create and the burdens that it will impose, not on the corporation, not on this aggregation of wealth, but on the community in which this great machinery operates.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will permit me, I understood the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], quoting the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], to say that the Senator from New Jersey objected to this tax on account of the large amount that it would impose.

Mr. GRAY. I am not considering the objections of the Senator from New Jersey. I am considering a much broader question than anything I heard the Senator from New Jersey allude to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from New Jersey to state that the Pennsylvania Railroad alone would have to pay about a million dollars under this provision.

Mr. GRAY. That is not a sufficient amount of tax to be an offset to what I conceive to be its hardship and its burden. I believe that the taxes which are most widely diffused will bear with the lightest weight and with the least burden upon the people at large. We can raise $30,000,000 by a tariff tax upon the two articles of tea and coffee, which no State can touch, which are easily collected, which would create no subsidy for any private interest. Every dollar of it will go into the Treasury and not a dollar into the pockets of any subsidized or favored class.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. SEWELL. I stated the amount at about $500,000,000, which means $5,000,000, a pretty fair tax on a railroad, besides the other taxes they have to pay under this bill for all their transfers of stock, etc., amounting to several million more. But what I objected to was the duplication from the initial point, having to pay another $5,000,000 at the other end.

Mr. GRAY. That is what I understood the Senator from New Jersey to say, and that is in line with my objection to the unnecessary interference and irritating character of this tax, to which I have alluded.

Now, Mr. President, there is another question to which I wish to allude very briefly. At this late hour I ask pardon of the Senate for saying anything. I believe, sir, that in our place here—in considering the propriety of a Federal tax, we are bound to consider the dual form of our Government. In performing our high function as the legislative body of the Union with limited powers under the Constitution of the United States, we are bound to remember that this Government is the agent of sovereign States, each of them possessing in a primary fashion, which the Government of the United States does not possess, the taxing power unlimited, and, in relation to the purposes to which it is applied, vastly more wide and far-reaching than any purposes that are committed by the Constitution to the Congress of the United States.

All the great purposes of civilized life, all the great purposes of society which require taxation belong to the States, and we can not meddle with them. We are here as deputies of the States; we are here as ambassadors from the States, and we can not forget that other and wider domain of taxation which belongs to the States severally in their capacity as sovereign members of this great sisterhood of republics.

Now, Mr. President, the sum of State taxation is vastly more than the sum of the Federal taxation. Not only the enumerated objects for which the Federal Government can impose taxation, but all conceivable subjects of taxation are committed to the State governments for the protection of life and liberty and social order, for the policing of the everyday life of the citizen. All that belongs to the States, and their domain of taxation ought not to be needlessly, not to say ruthlessly, invaded by us who stand here as the agents of the Federal Government and as the agents and deputies of the States themselves.

In the formation of the Federal Constitution we have had committed to the Federal Government a domain of taxation that is excluded from the use of the States, to which they can not resort, and it has been the policy of this Government, so far as it might, to confine the burden of Federal taxation to that exclusive domain. We have the tariff taxation, to which the States can not resort, and upon which largely has the burden of Federal taxation wisely been placed. I do not believe without great circumspection, without an exigency which would be apparent to all, that we should lay these taxes, which are bound to duplicate State taxes, and enact into law a system of levy that must seriously interfere with the sovereign taxing power of every State in this Union.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Delaware permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Would the Senator suggest raising the extraordinary sums which must be raised to meet these war expenses, which may be from four hundred to eight hundred million dollars in twelve months, by increasing our tariff provisions?

Mr. GRAY. Yes; I would put a tax on tea and coffee and raise $30,000,000 at once without putting a cent into the pockets of any private interest or class.

Mr. WOLCOTT. On tea I agree with the Senator; but would he raise several hundred millions by increased tariff provisions?

Mr. GRAY. No; I am only speaking now of this stamp tax as being a mode of taxation which is unnecessary, interfering, burdensome, and destructive of the power of the States.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But I understood the Senator to say that the Federal Government had reserved to itself a certain domain of taxation into which the States could not enter?

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is practically limited to the tariff, is it not?

Mr. GRAY. Practically, yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If it is practically limited to the tariff—

Mr. GRAY. And to the income from the sale of public lands.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But that in these late days would not amount to a drop in the bucket. It is practically limited to a tariff and nothing else. Then the Senator's suggestion is that the several hundred million dollars annually ought to be raised by increasing our tariff, as I understand him?

Mr. GRAY. It can be raised largely in that way.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And that is the Senator's suggestion of the proper way?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator is making suggestions for me.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I would not do that.

Mr. GRAY. I have no objection at all to his interruption, nor have I any objection to his making inferences from any proposition I have laid down.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I would not for the world do that.

Mr. GRAY. But we are not now discussing a tariff bill. I suppose it will be competent to put an amendment on this bill—

Mr. LINDSAY. I suggest to the Senator you may raise more money by reducing the tariff than by raising it.

Mr. GRAY. That is true.

Mr. LINDSAY. We have raised it so high now that—

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky a question? Would he suggest the raising of three or four hundred million dollars a year by taking off some of our tariff taxes?

Mr. GRAY. By reducing some of them.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Would he be by reducing them?

Mr. LINDSAY. You have placed tariff exclusions wherever you could. The bill is made up of tariff exclusions wherever they could be imposed.

Mr. GEAR. I call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the fact that it did not work well in 1894 and in 1897.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not quite certain whether I understand the Senator's argument. We are now talking about imposing a stamp tax upon certain instruments. I do not know that any State ever undertook to impose a stamp tax upon any instruments at any time. It has been, as I supposed, one of the recognized means of levying taxes, especially in war times, upon the part of the Federal Government, to impose a stamp tax.

Mr. GRAY. They do not call it a stamp tax, but the States raised revenue by various methods of taxation, including taxes on business, occupations, manufactures, railroads, and corporations generally.

Mr. ALDRICH. But this is a stamp tax definitely and distinctly.

Mr. GRAY. A stamp tax is prima facie an odious tax. It may be a necessary tax. I do not think it is a necessary tax to-day.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator does not think it is an unconstitutional tax?

Mr. GRAY. No; I did not say that. It is not unconstitutional. The power of the Federal Government in regard to taxation as granted by the Constitution is unlimited in amount.

Mr. ALDRICH. Or that it is a method of taxation that ought to belong to the States alone?

Mr. GRAY. And the only limit upon it is the good sense and the patriotism of the Congress that deals with such a subject.

Now, Mr. President, I believe that these subjects of taxation, as largely as possible and as largely as the needs of the Federal Government will justify, should be left untouched, in order that the States may use them and employ their means of taxation to raise the revenue so necessary for the large aggregate amount of taxation that the States naturally levy upon their citizens and the business transacted within their limits.

Mr. President, the aggregate of the State, county, and municipal taxation is three or four times the amount of Federal taxation. You can not enter this domain of taxation as to a single item without duplicating a State tax. Some one has said here in the course of this debate that there are States here who pay all their State expenses out of the tax on the railroads. Why should it not be left to them? Unless there is an absolute exigency, why should we duplicate that taxation and add to the burden that is placed upon the transportation of passengers and commodities within the States or between the States? All these things are conveniences of civilization.

They are conveniences that enter into the life of the poorest as well as of the wealthiest citizens. The tax burden that is placed upon the community at large is greater upon its poorer members when you make more expensive the operation of the machinery of civilized life or place the interfering hand of the Government upon these great instrumentalities of commerce so important to the wealth-producing capacity of a people.

For this reason, Mr. President, I shall vote against these stamp taxes, not that they are unconstitutional, not that there may not a time come when it will be necessary to resort to them, but there is no compensation in the amount of revenue that is estimated to come from this method of taxation that will at all, in my opinion, compensate for the burden that it will place upon the business activities upon which the general well-being so largely depends.

Mr. BERRY. I should like very much to have a short executive session, and, with the consent of the Senator from Iowa, I will so move.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator will allow a vote to be taken on the pending amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Senators tell me on this side that a vote can not be taken. It would be so late that we should miss the executive session. It is quite important to have an executive session.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know that anybody else wants to discuss the amendment.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] remarked that we could not have a vote to-night, and I presume he wants to discuss it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Unless somebody does want to discuss it, I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will allow us to have a short executive session.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to an executive session, but I think if we can get a vote on the amendment it will save a long time in discussing it to-morrow morning.

Mr. BERRY. There were a number of Senators called away, and it will not be possible to have a yes-and-may vote this evening.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. ALDRICH. It will not be a yes-and-may vote.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee, on page 40, line 23, beginning with the words "Express and Freight" and ending with the word "conversations," in line 14, page 42.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is the committee amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the committee amendment on pages 40, 41, and 42, the text of which has been perfected this afternoon.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg pardon.

The amendment was agreed to.

HOURLY MEETING.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 2, 1898, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 1, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

POST QUARTERMASTER-SERGEANTS OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 10051, to increase the number of post quartermaster-sergeants of the United States Army. The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the number of post quartermaster-sergeants of the Army be increased by the addition of twenty-five post quartermaster-sergeants, to be appointed by the Secretary of War in the manner now provided for by law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has been reported?

Mr. SIMPSON. Reserving the right to object, I hope we shall have some explanation of it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. HULL. I ask that the report be read, which will fully set it out.

The report (by Mr. HULL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10051) entitled "A bill to increase the number of post quartermaster-sergeants in the United States Army," report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The increase in the number of post quartermaster-sergeants in the United States Army seems to be necessary for the efficiency of the service. The Quartermaster-General, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs dated May 17, 1898, sets forth the cost of twenty-five additional post quartermaster-sergeants; also the cost of twenty-five clerks that would be necessary in case this bill should not become a law.

This letter, which is hereto attached and made a part of this report, shows that it will be a saving of over $9,000 per annum to have this work done by post quartermaster-sergeants.

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 17, 1898.

SIR: Replying to your telegram of to-day, in reference to difference in pay or cost of twenty-five additional post quartermaster-sergeants requested by this Department, I have the honor to invite your attention to the following: Pay and allowance of a post quartermaster-sergeant for first five years of enlistment.

	First year.	Second year.	Third year.	Fourth year.	Fifth year.	Total.
Pay	$408.00	$408.00	$420.00	$432.00	$444.00	$2,112.00
Clothing	63.14	26.28	36.96	26.28	23.72	176.38
Rations	66.70	66.70	66.70	66.70	66.70	333.50
Fuel, estimated value for one year	22.00	22.00	22.00	22.00	22.00	110.00
Total for five years						$2,776.88
Average cost, 1 sergeant, one year						555.37
Cost, 25 sergeants, one year						13,884.25
Add 20 per cent increase in time of war on pay proper, act approved April 20, 1898						2,112.00
Total cost, 25 sergeants, one year, war basis						15,996.25

The sergeants are also furnished with quarters, medical attendance, etc., which can not well be reduced to a money value.

In answer to your second telegram as to difference in expense in case civilian clerks are provided in lieu of post quartermaster-sergeants, I would say that the 25 clerks could not be secured for a less sum than $1,000 per annum each, making a total of $25,000 per annum for the 25 men, which is considerable more than the cost of 25 post quartermaster-sergeants.

Post quartermaster-sergeants are selected from sergeants of the line who are familiar with quartermasters' duties, and who are required to pass a special examination before appointment. We already have a large number of examined candidates ready for appointment. Civilian clerks would not only be more expensive to the Government, but would not meet so well the requirements of the military service, nor would civilian clerks answer in the present emergency, which calls for men expert in quartermasters' duties.

Post quartermaster-sergeants are what the service actually requires, and I hope and earnestly recommend that they be provided.

Very respectfully,

M. I. LUDINGTON,

Quartermaster-General United States Army.

Hon. J. A. T. HULL,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

[House Document No. 384, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., March 23, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of a letter of the Quartermaster-General of the Army, dated March 23, 1898, in which he represents that, in view of the recent establishment of new artillery posts on the seacoast, it is impracticable, with the present authorized number of post quartermaster-sergeants (eighty), to fill requisitions for the services of such sergeants without withdrawing sergeants from other stations where they are needed, and recommends that the number be increased not less than twenty-five.

The recommendation is concurred in by the Adjutant-General of the Army.

Very respectfully,

R. A. ALGER,

Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,

Washington, March 23, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the act of Congress approved July 8, 1894, relating to post quartermaster-sergeants, which reads as follows:

"That the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint, on the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General, as many post quartermaster-sergeants, not to exceed eighty, as he may deem necessary for the interests of the service, said sergeants to be selected by examination from the most competent enlisted men of the Army who have served at least four years, and whose character and education shall fit them to take charge of public property and to act as clerks and assistants to post and other quartermasters; said post quartermaster-sergeants shall, so far as practicable, perform the duties of storekeepers and clerks in lieu of citizen employees. The post quartermaster-sergeants shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War, and shall receive for their services the same pay and allowances as ordnance sergeants."

Since the enactment of the above law and the appointment of the post quartermaster-sergeants thereunder, the services of these sergeants have proven highly satisfactory and valuable to the quartermaster's department at military posts, where they assist the quartermaster in the performance of duties of storekeepers and clerks in lieu of citizen employees.

The full complement of these sergeants (80), as now provided by law, are in the service, and, with only two exceptions, are now on duty at military posts.

In view of the recent establishment of new artillery posts on the seacoast, applications are now coming in from these posts for the services of a post quartermaster-sergeant, and this office finds that, with the present authorized number of sergeants, these requisitions can not be filled without withdrawing sergeants from other stations where they are needed, which would be detrimental to the public interest.

To meet the new conditions created by the establishment of so many new posts, an increase of not less than 25 post quartermaster-sergeants in the number now allowed by law is actually required. I therefore recommend that the necessary steps be taken with a view to securing immediate legislation from Congress increasing the number of post quartermaster-sergeants from 80 to 105. The method of appointment, examination, and other requirements, duties, pay, and allowances of the additional number should be governed by the present law relating to these sergeants.

Very respectfully,

M. I. LUDINGTON,

Quartermaster-General United States Army.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SIMPSON. Before consent is given, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the chairman make some further explanation.

Mr. HULL. If the House could have heard the report which has just been read, it would not be necessary to say much, for it sets forth very clearly the object of the bill and the necessity for its passage. The law in regard to post quartermaster-sergeants and their selection is that they shall be taken from the sergeants already in the Army, after competitive examination, and they receive a compensation of $34 a month, while civilian clerks get a compensation of $1,000 a year.

The law, as far as it has gone in displacing civilian clerks by post quartermaster-sergeants, has been, according to the general in charge of that department, of great benefit in the way of efficiency and economy. The addition of two artillery regiments and the posts that are to be supplied make it necessary either to have 105 post quartermaster-sergeants or 105 post quartermaster-sergeants and civilian employees. The testimony of the War Department is that this is not a war measure so much as it is a necessity for efficiency and economy of the service, both now and in time of peace, and the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster-General, with all the investigation we could give it, has led me and the Committee on Military Affairs to unanimously believe that the best interests of the service will be conserved by the immediate passage of this bill.

All there is to it is, you take twenty-five of the sergeants now in the Army, a majority of them who have come up from the ranks and displayed ability in this line of work, who can pass examination, and detail them for this business at a salary which the sergeant of ordnance gets, of $34 a month. If you will not do that it will be necessary to employ civilian clerks at a salary of $1,000 a year. I will say to the House that the benefits that come to the sergeant by promotion are that there is a time in his life when he will be entitled to go on the retired list at three-quarters pay; and if he remains in the service as a sergeant, he will be entitled to go on the retired list at three-quarters pay, but the pay would be less than a post quartermaster-sergeant.

Mr. McMILLIN. Allow me an interruption right there. Will not the places of these sergeants have to be filled by other sergeants, who also would be entitled to go on the retired list?

Mr. HULL. Yes; I was going to say that when they are promoted to these positions other corporals will be put in their places. It increases the sergeants of the Army from the present number by twenty-five, but it does not increase the size of the Army.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is not this purely civilian's work?

Mr. HULL. No more than the work in the Quartermaster-General's Department, from general down, is civilian's work. It is largely clerical.

Mr. McMILLIN. It has always been done by civilians.

Mr. HULL. No; it has not. It was before the office of post quartermaster-sergeant was created.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is there not another element of cost not taken into account, to wit, the fact that if these men become disabled from any cause they will be pensionable, whereas the civilians will not?

Mr. HULL. Not from any cause, but from any cause in the line of their duty.

Mr. McMILLIN. I mean from any cause in the line of their duty.

Mr. HULL. Yes; but if the gentleman from Tennessee will take into consideration the difference in the cost to the Government between $400 a year and $1,000 a year, he will see that there is a large margin to meet any contingency of that kind that may come up. If men who understand this business thoroughly are to be believed, you increase the efficiency of the service by this change.

Mr. CANNON. My friend from Iowa says the quartermaster-sergeants that perform this duty would cost $400 a year. That is the actual payment to him?

Mr. HULL. The actual payment is $408.

Mr. CANNON. Does he not get other allowances that would swell it up to $1,000 a year?

Mr. HULL. No; he does not. I think he gets one ration a day.

Mr. CANNON. Does he not get clothing?

Mr. HULL. I think there is no extra allowance for clothing over what he would get as a private soldier. Neither is there an increase of rations.

Mr. CANNON. Now, what do the clothing and rations amount to?

Mr. HULL. The rations amount to about 25 cents a day.

Mr. SPALDING. Eighteen cents a day.

Mr. HULL. Eighteen cents a day, my friend informs me. I have not looked into the matter.

Mr. CANNON. And what does the clothing amount to?

Mr. HULL. Two or three suits are furnished a year, amounting, I presume, to $40, but I can not state exactly. This has nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. SPALDING. Fifty-two dollars.

Mr. CANNON. I am only saying that this employee gets his thousand dollars a year without rations, without transportation, and without clothing.

Mr. HULL. The House must remember that this does not increase the number of enlisted men in the Army. When you come to the rations, the enlisted man of the Army gets the same ration as the sergeant does. The sergeant is an enlisted man just as the privates are.

Mr. SIMPSON. This bill makes the increase in the Army permanent?

Mr. HULL. Absolutely, so far as number of sergeants.

Mr. SIMPSON. This increase will continue after the war is over?

Mr. HULL. Absolutely.

Mr. SIMPSON. The present method is to employ civilian clerks in accordance with the number needed, so that when the war is over the number might be decreased and the expense thereby reduced.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman has a wrong idea. This does not apply to the general civilian clerks employed as a war measure. They get $100 a month. They are entirely independent of the post requirements. They are in the Quartermaster's Department in the field. This has nothing to do with the general provision in regard to civilian clerks. This applies only to posts where they need either a civilian clerk all the time or a sergeant all the time, and the request for these additional employees was independent of any war measure whatever.

Mr. SIMPSON. The fact remains that if the Army is increased during the war, it will need more clerks, and after the war they will not need so many; and of course the ordinary civilian clerks could in that case be discharged.

Mr. HULL. They are provided for in an entirely different way, and this bill has nothing to do with that. There is another provision of law that authorizes these departments to employ all the clerks they need; and under that provision they are appointing clerks and sending them to New Orleans and Tampa and out to Camp Alger—to every place where there is a concentration of troops.

Mr. SIMPSON. I am inclined to think that the best policy is to employ civilian clerks wherever they can be employed, even if for the time being it should cost a little more.

Mr. HULL. That policy would involve both additional cost and the loss of efficiency.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is a question.

Mr. CANNON. I am not antagonizing the gentleman's bill. I merely wanted to understand what it proposes to do. I am not prepared to say I am opposed to it, because the gentleman has knowledge in such matters that I have not.

Mr. HULL. The facts are stated very fully in the report. There are now eighty post quartermaster-sergeants.

Mr. HANDY. How many new military posts on the seacoast have lately been established?

Mr. HULL. I can not answer that further than to say that there are two new regiments of artillery provided for coast defense. That is a matter which the Committee on Appropriations would, I presume, be familiar with.

Mr. CANNON. I can say that the Endicott plan, as I understand it, contemplates the fortification of twenty-seven points; and the sundry civil bill, together with the Army bill, carries appropriations for barracks and quarters at many of these places.

Mr. HANDY. How many?

Mr. CANNON. I can not tell the gentleman how many. At some of them, the troops have to live in tents. When the whole plan is completed, there will be twenty-seven of these posts. I hope that they will not all be completed for a long time to come; but just how many of them are necessary to be occupied under the ordinary appropriations and under expenditures from extraordinary appropriations I can not tell.

Mr. HULL. My recollection is that there are about twenty-two now, but I would not state that positively. There are about twenty-two now that will need an officer of this kind at once.

Mr. HANDY. The law at present authorizes eighty of these post quartermaster-sergeants?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANDY. Now, because we are establishing additional posts along the seacoast this bill asks for twenty-five additional post quartermaster-sergeants. It seems to me that as the Army is withdrawn from the interior posts and concentrated at great camps and sent for active service in the field the War Department ought to be able to withdraw from the posts where the Army has hitherto been stationed enough post quartermaster-sergeants to supply these seacoast places. Why not?

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman from Delaware point out a single post where they have withdrawn all the troops, so that it is not necessary to keep a post quartermaster-sergeant or a clerk? Is there a single post in the United States where troops have been kept and where a post quartermaster-sergeant has been necessary, where the troops have been withdrawn entirely, so that they are not compelled to keep quartermaster's supplies?

Mr. HANDY. How many soldiers have been left at these posts?

Mr. HULL. In all of them somebody is left and has to be looked after.

Mr. HANDY. There are possibly some posts where there are only three or four soldiers—barely enough to occupy and protect the Government property.

Mr. SIMPSON. At many of them there are not half a dozen soldiers.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman name a post where there are not more than half a dozen soldiers?

Mr. SIMPSON. There are some, I understand.

Mr. HANDY. Now, when at some of these posts there are only four or five or half a dozen men left, is it possible that a post quartermaster-sergeant is indispensable?

Mr. HULL. Can the gentleman name any posts where there are only four or five or half a dozen men?

Mr. HANDY. It is my impression that there are such posts. Will the gentleman tell us the facts?

Mr. HULL. My information is that at all these posts a certain number of soldiers are left, requiring that there be a post quartermaster-sergeant there to take charge of Government stores and issue them to the men who are there.

Mr. HANDY. How many are left over here at Fort Myer?

Mr. HULL. There are a good many there now. They have, I think, two troops there yet.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How about Fort Lowell?

Mr. HANDY. How about Fort Lowell, in Arizona? Do they need a quartermaster's sergeant over there?

Mr. HULL. I do not know anything about Fort Lowell. I do not know whether they have a post quartermaster-sergeant there or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is this bill reported unanimously from the committee?

Mr. HULL. There was not a dissenting voice in the committee. It was the universal sentiment of the committee that in the interest of the service, both in economy and efficiency, the bill should be passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does increase the number of enlisted men and sergeants?

Mr. HULL. It does not increase the number of enlisted men. It increases the number of post quartermaster-sergeants.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In places now being filled by civilians?

Mr. HULL. In places now being filled by civilians.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the gentleman say it does not increase the force? He admitted a short time ago that when a sergeant was promoted another sergeant must take his place, and then a corporal take his place, and so on all along down the line.

Mr. HULL. No; a post quartermaster-sergeant is just as much an enlisted man as a private is, and when we placed the limit on the Regular Army, we placed it on the enlisted force of the Army. This man is as much an enlisted man as anybody else. When you promote a corporal to the position of sergeant, you know you promote from the position of corporal, but you do not fill the private's place where he has been promoted to corporal while there is a limit on the Army.

Mr. SIMPSON. I do not know.

Mr. HANDY. Does the gentleman mean to inform the House that this bill will result in dismissing twenty-five civilians who are now employed to do this work?

Mr. HULL. I mean exactly that, if they are employed. If there is a civilian in a post who is already drawing a thousand dollars a year, it will dismiss him and place a man in there to draw about $400 a year.

Mr. HANDY. If I understand the report from the committee, these men are to take places which are not now occupied at all. This bill will not result in the dismissing of a single civilian employee.

Mr. HULL. In the main; but, taking your question in the broader scope, it will prevent the employment of civilians, if you want to put it in that way; or where a civilian is already employed, it will cause his dismissal and fill his place with a sergeant.

Mr. HANDY. That would be more nearly in accordance with the proposition as contained in the letters from the heads of the Department.

Mr. HULL. It will displace a civilian in any post where there is one now employed if the place can be filled by a post quartermaster-sergeant.

Mr. HANDY. Is there a civilian now in the service doing post quartermaster-sergeant's work?

Mr. HULL. I do not know whether there is or not. It makes no difference so far as this bill is concerned whether there is or not, because, if there is, his services will be dispensed with. If there is not, it will prevent the employment of one, so that it can make no difference one way or the other.

Mr. HANDY. According to the statement just made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], it would appear that when the Endicott plan has been fully carried out, there may be a need for at least twenty-five additional post quartermaster-sergeants; but I can not see how the whole twenty-five can possibly be needed until that plan has been fully carried out.

Mr. HULL. If they are not needed, the law does not make it imperative to appoint the whole twenty-five. It says not to exceed twenty-five.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then this bill would have the effect of taking out of the service this number of soldiers, who would take the place of civilians—places that civilians might fill—and we should lose the services of that many men in the Army when we need them now.

Mr. HULL. There is no limit now, except up to 61,000. The limit is when there is no war.

Mr. SIMPSON. It seems to me that the sergeants who would get these promotions are men of experience, and we need their services in the field now rather than to take the places of civilian clerks to do clerical work.

Mr. HULL. I think my friend from Kansas is pettifoggling a little in his question.

Mr. SIMPSON. Oh, no.

Mr. HULL. The idea in his mind and in mine, too—

Mr. SIMPSON. I am trying to get what will be of the most benefit to the country.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman's idea and mine, too, ought to be to pass what is best for the efficiency of the service. That ought to be the question for all of us to pass upon, and from all that I can learn in regard to the matter this is a step in the direction of efficiency, carrying out what was started by Congress a few years ago, and that it is in the line both of economy and efficiency of the service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in consideration of the importance of these bills, and that I do not think they are of such urgent nature as to need to be considered at once, believing that they ought to be considered in the regular way and not by unanimous consent when there is evidently no quorum of the House present, I shall be compelled to demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the regular order.

RESIGNATION OF REPRESENTATIVE SULLIVAN, OF MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter; which was read by the Clerk:

UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington, D. C., May 21, 1898.

SIR: I have this day forwarded to the governor of Mississippi my resignation as member of the Fifty-fifth Congress from the Second district of Mississippi, to take effect to-day.

Respectfully,

W. V. SULLIVAN.

Hon. T. B. REED,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

EXECUTION OF WILLS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report on the bill S. 1910. Mr. Speaker, this is, as its title indicates, a bill conferring on the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to take proof of the execution of wills affecting real estate, and for other purposes. The House amended the Senate bill by striking out the text of that bill and substituting another bill. The Senate has concurred in the amendment of the House, with three very slight amendments, two of them being verbal only, and the third providing for the probate of wills in the District of Columbia that have been probated in some other jurisdiction. The matter embraced in the bill has been submitted to the judges of the supreme court and to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, and meets with the entire approval of the bar of the District. I do not know of any objections whatever to the conference report, and I ask for a vote upon it.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1910) conferring on the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to take proof of the execution of wills affecting real estate, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same amended as follows:

In section 8 of the proposed amendment, after the words "Provided, That," insert the word "in."

In the same section, after the words "orphans' court business," strike out the words "upon the petition of."

Insert a new section to stand as section 10, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. That the record in the office of the register of wills for the District of Columbia of a duly certified copy, or transcript of the record of proceedings, admitting any will or codicil to probate outside of the District of Columbia; and the record in said office of any will or codicil heretofore admitted to probate in said District, and which shall not have been annulled or declared void according to law prior to the passage of this act, shall be deemed and held, at law and in equity, as of the same and like force and effect as if such will or codicil had been duly proved and admitted to probate and record under and in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any proceeding at law or in equity pending at the date of the passage of this act, or commenced within one year after the passage of this act, wherein or whereby the validity of such will or codicil is or shall be called in question."

Number the sections consecutively.

And that the House agree to the same.

JOHN J. JENKINS,
JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
Conferees on the part of the House of Representatives.
CHAS. J. FAULKNER,
LUCIEN BAKER,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The Senate agrees to the House amendment as amended.

Amend House bill, page 9, line 1 of section 8, by inserting the word "in" after the words "Provided, That," and in line 3 of the same section and page, strike out the words "upon the petition of."

Insert a new section to stand as section 10.

Number the sections consecutively.

JOHN J. JENKINS,
JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

STREET PARKING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 5880) to vest in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the control of the street parking in said District.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, in regard to that, on behalf of the conferees, I would like the consent of the House to withdraw the report for further conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks the consent of the House to withdraw the conference report. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES IMPOSED BY FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4578) to remove all disabilities imposed by section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all disabilities imposed by fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States upon persons on account of having engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and on account of having given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, are hereby removed.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary were read:

Amend by changing the title so as to read as follows:

"To remove all disability imposed by section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

Further amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and insert as follows:

"That the disability imposed by section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States heretofore incurred is hereby removed."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that the committee have reported an amendment to the Senate bill. It was deemed necessary because of the unfortunate wording of the Senate bill. It was evidently drawn in haste, and there will be no conflict or difference of opinion between the Senate and the House when the Senate comes to consider the House measure. I ask unanimous consent to have the report of the committee printed as a part of my remarks.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope that will be granted. It is a good report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. JENKINS) is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration (S. 4578) an act to remove all disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of the Constitution, and after a careful consideration report the same back with amendments, with recommendation that when so amended the same do pass.

Amend by changing the title so as to read as follows:

"To remove all disability imposed by section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

Further amend by striking out all after the enacting clause, and insert as follows:

"That the disability imposed by section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States heretofore incurred is hereby removed."

Section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

"SECTION III. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States or under any State who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature or as an executive or judicial officer of any State to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, but Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability."

The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was proposed by Congress and submitted to the ratification of the States by the act of June 16, 1868. On July 20, 1868, Mr. Seward, then Secretary of State, after receiving notice of ratification by the reconstructed legislatures, issued his proclamation announcing that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was in force, and shortly thereafter Congress declared the same a part of the Constitution.

Section 3 of the amendment with which the committee have to deal in effect provides that "any person who had previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State to support the Constitution of the United States, who engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same or gave aid or comfort to the enemies thereof should not be a Senator, or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, but Congress might, by two-thirds vote of each House, remove such disability."

Thus five classes of persons could be placed under disability by the amendment in question. No doubt the immediate object of the amendment was to prevent the return to public life of some of the leaders of the rebellion, and no doubt Congress was of the opinion that the security of the Government required that the persons described in the third section should, for the time being, be excluded from Congress, from the electoral college, and from all civil and military offices, State and Federal.

But that it was not intended that this exclusion should be permanent or universal is evidenced by the provision that "Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House remove such disability." The amendment therefore, while it excluded from the rights and privileges named therein certain classes of citizens in the Southern States, left it to the discretion of Congress to remove the disability imposed in any and all cases where it was satisfied that it might be done with safety to the interests of the country. In his Twenty Years of Congress, Mr. Blaine makes the following interesting statement upon the operation of this section:

"The political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution affected large classes in the Southern States. When the amendment was under discussion in Congress, the total number affected was estimated at 14,000, but subsequently it was ascertained to be much greater. It included not only those who had been members of Congress or held any office under the United States, but all those who had been executive and judicial officers or members of the legislatures in the revolted States. The proclamation making its ratification known to the people was issued by Secretary Seward on the 20th of July, 1868, but in advance of this formal announcement Congress, then in session, began to relieve the persons affected.

"The first act was for the benefit of Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee, Representative-elect to the Fortieth Congress. It was approved on 19th of June, 1868, and permission was given him to take a modified oath. On the 25th of June amnesty was extended to about 1,000 persons, and during the remainder of Congress some 800 more were relieved from political disability. In the Forty-first Congress the liberality of the majority did not grow less, and during the two years 3,300 participants in the rebellion, among them some of the most prominent and influential, were restored to the full privileges of citizenship, the rule being in fact that everyone who asked for it either through himself or his friends was freely granted remission of penalty."

"At the opening of the Forty-second Congress it was evident that the practice of removing the disabilities of individuals would not find favor as in the two preceding Congresses. There was a disposition rather to classify and reserve for further consideration the really offending man and give general amnesty to all others. To this end, Mr. HALE, of Maine, on the 18th of April, 1871, moved to suspend the rules in order that a bill, introduced by him April 10, 1871, might be passed, removing legal and political disabilities from all persons who had participated in the rebellion, except the following classes:

"First. Members of the Congress of the United States who withdrew therefrom and aided the rebellion.

"Second. Officers of the Army and Navy who, being above the age of 21 years, left the service and aided the rebellion.

"Third. Members of the State conventions who voted for pretended ordinances of secession.

"It was further provided that before receiving the benefit of this act each person should take an oath of loyalty before the clerk of a United States court or before a United States commissioner. Debate was not allowed, and the bill passed by more than the requisite two-thirds—ayes 134, nays 46.

"When the bill came up before the Senate, Mr. Robertson, of South Carolina, attempted to put it on its passage, but objection being made it was referred under the rule and postponed for the session."

At the second session of this Congress the bill of Mr. HALE was taken up. A motion by Senator Sumner was made to amend it by the insertion of his civil-rights bill.

This amendment was adopted by the casting vote of the Vice-President February 9, 1872, and the bill as thus amended was defeated—yeas 83, nays 19. In his message of December 4, 1871, President Grant urged the removal of disabilities in the following language:

"More than six years have elapsed since the last hostile gun was fired between the armies then arrayed against each other, one for the perpetuation, the other for the destruction, of the Union. It may well be considered whether it is not now time that the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment should be removed; that amendment does not exclude the ballot, but only imposes the disability to hold office upon certain classes. When the purity of the ballot is secure, majorities are sure to elect officers reflecting the views of the majority."

"I do not see the advantage or propriety of excluding men from office merely because they were before the rebellion of standing and character sufficient to be elected to positions requiring them to take oaths to support the Constitution and admitting to eligibility those entertaining precisely the same views, but of less standing in their communities. It may be said that the former violated an oath while the latter did not. If they had taken this oath, it can not be doubted that they would have broken it, as did the former classes. If there are any great criminals distinguished above all others for the part they took in opposition to the Government, they might, in the judgment of Congress, be excluded from such an amnesty. This subject is submitted for your careful consideration."

On January 18, 1872, Mr. HALE moved to suspend the rules and put upon its passage an amnesty bill similar in all respects to his previous bill mentioned by Mr. Blaine, except that it omitted the third class excepted from amnesty in the first bill. This bill was passed by the House—ayes 171, nays 31; action was taken upon it in the Senate May 9, 1872, when it was amended by the casting vote of the Vice-President, and was lost in its passage by a vote of 33 yeas to 22 nays May 10, 1872. On May 13, 1872, Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts, reported from the Judiciary Committee a bill to remove all legal and political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States from all persons who have ever except Senators and Representatives of the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congresses, officers in the judicial, military, and naval service of the United States, heads of Departments and foreign ministers of the United States. In reporting this bill Mr. Butler said:

"The House instructed the Committee on the Judiciary to report an amnesty bill containing the names of all the persons for the removal of whose disabilities application has been made to Congress. The other day (April 26) the committee reported such a bill (H. R. 2564) containing some 15,000 or 16,000 names. The bill was ordered to be printed and recommitted. Since then amendments have been proposed including some twenty-five pages of additional names. I have also been instructed by the committee to report a general amnesty bill instead, which I now do."

On the same day the House, under a suspension of the rules, passed both of these bills by the necessary two-thirds vote.

The general amnesty bill (H. R. 2761) was subsequently passed by the Senate May 21, 1872, only two votes being recorded against it, and it was approved by President Grant on the following day.

On June 1 President Grant issued his proclamation directing the district attorneys of the United States to dismiss all proceedings in quo warranto which had been instituted against all persons relieved of disability by the provisions of this act. In his message to Congress of December 1, 1873, President Grant again urged the subject of general amnesty. He said:

"I renew my previous recommendation to Congress for general amnesty. The number engaged in the late rebellion yet laboring under disability is very small, but enough to keep up a constant irritation. No possible damage can accrue to the Government by restoring them to eligibility to hold office."

In response to this appeal, Mr. Maynard, of Tennessee, under instructions from the Committee on Rules, offered a bill (H. R. 472) granting general amnesty and prescribing an oath of office. The first section of this bill removed all disabilities imposed by section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. The second section of the bill repealed the act of July 2, 1863, prescribing what is known as "the ironclad oath," and provided that hereafter any person elected to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office and being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the oath prescribed by the act of July 11, 1868, entitled "An act prescribing an oath of office to be taken by persons from whom legal disabilities shall have been removed."

This bill was passed the same day, under a suspension of the rules, by a vote of 141 yeas and 29 noes.

On December 15, 1875, a similar bill was introduced by Mr. Randall, of Pennsylvania. To this an amendment was offered January 6, 1876, excluding Jefferson Davis from the provisions of the bill, which evoked an acrimonious debate, and the bill was defeated by a vote of 175 yeas to 97 noes. On January 10, 1878, the debate was continued on the bill introduced by Mr. Randall, during the course of which Mr. Randall took occasion to say: "Twice have Republican Houses passed this bill and twice has it been strangled in the Senate." Mr. Randall's language is to be found on page 323 of the RECORD of the date mentioned.

Mr. Blaine took part in the debate, saying: "It has been variously estimated that this section, at the time of its original insertion in the Constitution, included somewhere from 14,000 to 30,000 persons. As nearly as I can gather the facts of the case, it included about 18,000 men in the South."

And further on, continuing the subject, Mr. Blaine said:

"I have had occasion by conference with the Department of War and of the Navy and with the assistance of some records which I have caused to be searched to be able to state to the House, I believe with more accuracy than it has ever been stated heretofore, just the number of gentlemen in the South still under disability. Those who were officers of the United States Army, educated at its expense at West Point, and who joined the rebellion and are still included under this act, number, as nearly as the War Department can figure it up, 325; those in the Navy about 295; those under the other head, Senators and Representatives of the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congresses, officers in the judicial service of the United States, heads of Departments, and foreign ministers of the United States, make up a number somewhat more difficult to state accurately, but smaller in the aggregate. The whole sum of the entire list is about—it is probably impossible to state it with entire accuracy, and I do not attempt to do that—750 now under disabilities."

Your committee are pleased to rely upon the facts and arguments made in behalf of this bill by two of the greatest men of their party and times—General Grant and Mr. Blaine.

It will take more time than your committee have at its disposal to ascertain just how many are at this time affected by the amendment in question. We were advised that we would have to communicate with at least the executive branches of government of all of the reconstructed States, and they in turn would have to communicate with parties scattered throughout the various States; and the committee are of the opinion that it is entirely immaterial whether there are any now affected by the disability, and, if any, how many, and have confined their examination to the disability imposed by the fourteenth amendment.

In support of the removal of the disability imposed by the amendment under consideration, it is useless at this time to discuss the situation that led up to the adoption of this important amendment.

It is to be regretted that it was ever in the mind of any person that such extreme measures were necessary. Years have rolled by since that great struggle closed, and the American people look at public matters growing out of the war of 1861 in calmer moments when their judgment can be trusted and are willing to do exact and equal justice, and are practically unanimously of the opinion that this bill pass and the disability wholly removed from the statute book.

Long since the people of the reconstructed States became reconciled to the restoration of their States to their constitutional relations to the Union, and from the close of the war there was never any doubt in the minds of the patriotic, liberty-loving Union people of the United States but that the people of the reconstructed States wanted to return to their political duty as citizens of a common country and do their best to make this nation all our forefathers intended it should be, but were prevented from making it by causes forcing themselves upon the convention. We are now in truth and in fact a reunited people, a nation composed of the several States of the Union, and the time has come in American history when the distinction between Federal and State rights should no longer exist, but all should be classed as citizens of the United States, cooperating for the common good, recognizing the just powers of the nation and the constitutional rights of the several States without any intention to impair the one or invade the other.

The seeds of the war were sown when the convention framed the Constitution under which we are now living, and it was only a question of time when the growth would be ready for the sickle, and the war was simply reaping the harvest. To the American people, the war was worth the sacrifice. It accomplished at a terrible cost of life and money what could not be realized by any other means. The nation now has a united patriotic people to sustain its life and further its progress; imbued with most excellent elements of patriotism and civil liberty and the future of the nation is assured with the simple requirement only that the people be law abiding. Human law is not necessary for the cementing of the North and the South. They are truly one people.

While the time is opportune for kindly and considerate acts, the pending war with Spain was not necessary to bring together the people of the North and the South. The universal good feeling so patriotically expressed wherever the American flag floats is an indication that the people not only are, but for some time have been united. The nation needs the union, not only to do battle with foreign foes, but for the uplifting and building up of great interests for the betterment of the people. Great questions of vital importance to the people yet have to be settled, requiring patriotism, intelligence, forbearance, and statesmanship.

Much work remains to be done. These questions can not be settled as long as the people are sectionally divided. Sectionalism must never return. It is our duty to-day to do all we possibly can to prevent it. Earnest efforts must be continued for the upbuilding of the nation, for the common good of all. Keeping steadily in mind the equality of the States and equality of all before the law, allowing each elector and each State to exercise constitutional rights without force or denial, answerable to a higher power and intelligent surroundings, peace and prosperity will be with us as a nation.

It is gratifying to know that so many on both sides of that great conflict have been permitted to live long enough to learn that all of the bad feeling engendered by the war has passed away. In no other country on the globe could such conditions arise. Unhappily divided as we were, with a bitter warfare of over four years, a large part of our beloved country devastated, feeling strong, one section arrayed against the other, so that the whole country was involved, loss of life and property great, all tending to show how intensely bitter was the feeling between the two great sections of our nation, yet when the conflict ended, simultaneous with the laying down of arms and return to peace, word went forth that henceforth the people of the United States must and would be brethren. The glad tidings were indorsed by hearty handshakes by many of the contending forces and with softened feeling in the breasts of the two great armies. The survivors of them have faithfully kept the promise and have been the friends that only brave men can be. The excellent feeling prevailing teaches us that it is far better and more important to restore fraternal relations throughout the country than to stand on the strict letter of the law.

A little over thirty years have gone by since the curtain fell on the scenes of the civil war of 1861, and to-day many of those who were once in rebellion against the National Government are now in the same column marching side by side with those they once so bitterly opposed; marching under the flag of the Union; offering their life's blood upon the altar of their country in the defense of the nation they were once contending against. To-day loyalty is so universal throughout our beloved country that one can not tell whether the people come from the South or from the North. Certain it is that no political disability should rest upon any person or find any repose in the statutes of this country.

The committee are satisfied that the survivors or those once engaged in rebellion against this Government are loyal to the Union, and that it would be a fitting act before they all pass away, and while some of them are left, to remove the disability imposed by this amendment. The entire country feel that the nation to-day needs the assistance of all our citizens. It is best for all to feel an interest in the Government, and nothing should be said or done or allowed to remain that will in the least disturb the good feeling abroad in the land. What a glorious spectacle in so short a time—the North and South, once so fiercely divided, reunited. The North willing to remove all political disabilities, wipe out all sectional feeling, and the South ready to defend the nation with their lives and their money. In the pending conflict, forced upon us, it is apparent that the South affected by the amendment are loyal and earnest in their support of the Government; that they are ready to furnish all the men and means necessary to make this nation successful.

The parting words of General Grant have come true. Nothing more beautiful can be said in support of the passage of this bill than was written in the summer of 1865 by the victorious general of the armies of the United States when he sat in the chamber of death, confronting with the imperishable courage of his nature the last great adversary. He had but a few hours, or at most a few days, to live. Realizing his condition, in discussing what should be done and what would be done, he clutched his pen with dying fingers and left this inspiration for his countrymen.

"I feel that we are on the eve of a new era, when there is to be a great harmony between the Federal and the Confederate. I can not stay to be a living witness to the correctness of this prophecy, but I feel that it is to be so."

We certainly can make no mistake when we follow the dying words of our great leader, Grant.

Your committee believe that they but voice the sentiment of the people of this nation when they unanimously say, Let the disability be removed.

The safety and interests of the country do not require the disability to be in force.

To remove the same in accordance with the unanimous voice of the people is but a simple act of justice to the South as an expression of confidence by the North in the unquestionable loyalty of the Southern people.

Mr. JENKINS. I want to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is any necessity for extended debate on this bill, but there ought to be at least enough said to show that the House appreciated its importance and had fully considered it. A few days ago I went to the Valley of Virginia to hear Hon. John S. Wise, one of the cadets at Newmarket, make a strong patriotic speech over the graves of his old Confederate comrades and schoolmates who fell in that battle.

On the road we met three companies of young men clad in blue, with the flag flying over them, coming out of the Valley of Virginia. They were the sons of Stonewall Jackson's army, marching to the front to fight under the Stars and Stripes, under the banner of Fitzhugh Lee and of Wilson. Never in my life have I seen a more pleasing sight. Their march proclaimed the new day of patriotic reconciliation and national unity. It seems to me that there could be no more fitting time than now to absolutely eliminate from the statute books the last vestige of the disabilities made by the amendment to the Constitution against those who served upon the other side in the war of 1861-1865.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does not the gentleman think it ought to have been done years ago?

Mr. LACEY. I think so. I am glad to say to my friend from Tennessee that in the last Congress we passed a law that relieved from disabilities the soldiers of the rebellion who were graduates of West Point and permitted them to reenter the Army of the United States. Some one then said in debate, "What is the use of passing this bill? They will all be too old." Another answered, "No, they are not all too old, for there is General WHEELER. We shall not have any war, but if we do, he is still young enough to go; but let us pass it, and if we should have a war, he, and perhaps others, could serve." It so happened that the bill was passed in the last Congress, which provided in advance for the very circumstances that have deprived us of the association of our old friend General WHEELER, who is now under leave of absence on important business for the remainder of this session. [Applause.]

Mr. McMILLIN. As justifying my inquiry, I call my friend's attention to the fact that, while there has been nothing of that kind done since the close of the war, all have been looking anxiously for the protection and the glory of the country, and yet two years ago if the war had arisen General WHEELER and Fitzhugh Lee and their associates could not have gone in.

Mr. LACEY. That is true up to the time of the passage of the bill by the last Congress, and I am glad to say that it passed in time of profound peace, and it is doubtful to-day whether there is anyone remaining to whom the present bill will now apply, as bills have been passed from time to time relieving from disabilities various classes until nearly everybody has been relieved. Now we see the pleasant spectacle of these ex-Confederates commanding troops recruited in all parts of our country, and soon we will hear that they have met our common enemy. Miles and Lee, with Wilson and WHEELER, will make a formidable combination for any foe to meet.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me call the gentleman's attention to one misstatement. The gentleman from Alabama is not absent under leave of this House. The gentleman from Alabama has obtained no leave of this House to be absent, and could not as long as I am here.

Mr. McMILLIN. There is not a man in the House that does not laud the gentleman from Alabama for being absent on the patriotic mission upon which he is. [Applause.]

Mr. LACEY. I am surprised to hear my friend from Texas say that he would object.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not believe that any man in this country can hold a military office and his seat in Congress at the same time, and I would object if he were my own brother.

Mr. LACEY. I feel sorry for the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McMILLIN. So far as I am concerned, my voice will never be raised here against any man patriotic enough to go out and expose his body for the good of his country. [Applause.]

Mr. BAILEY. I will take occasion to say what I have to say after the gentleman from Iowa has finished.

Mr. LACEY. I am glad to know and to record the fact that it was not necessary in this Congress to pass a bill to enable the gentleman from Alabama, General WHEELER, to go to the front. That had been done on a previous occasion. But when we find General WHEELER and Gen. Fitzhugh Lee called Yankees and accepting the title in good nature and going to the front as Yankees to the tunes of "Yankee Doodle" and "Dixie," I say it is time there should not be a single man left under the ban of a war-time disability. [Applause.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, the present bill is an entirely proper one. I have no desire to add anything to what has been said, and, of course, no desire to say anything against what has been said. I ventured, however, a moment ago to contradict the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], that the House had granted leave to one of its members, who is now occupying a high, important, and dangerous position in the Army. I ventured to correct his statement, because such action on the part of the House would recognize the right of the gentleman to continue as a member of this House while holding office as a general in the Army of the United States, and I would not assent to any action which concedes the right of any man to hold these two offices at the same time. To me the Constitution of the United States is plain, and certainly the highest duty enjoined by patriotism is to respect it.

The Constitution declares that—

No Senator or Representative shall during the time for which he was elected be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

This provision prevents a member of the House during the time for which he has been elected from being appointed to any civil office created or the emoluments of which have been increased during that time. But, recognizing that there might come an hour of great peril when the Executive might need military officers who were serving in Congress, the provision was confined to appointments to civil office. The second provision, however, goes further than the first. It prohibits all persons holding any office under the United States from being a member of Congress during their continuance in office. The language is:

And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that language can not be broader or plainer than this.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will ask the gentleman whether, in addition to the constitutional provision—

Mr. BAILEY. There is also a statute on the subject:

No person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

Language can not be plainer than that.

Is the office of a major-general an office under the United States? If it is, the Constitution expressly forbids all persons holding such an office to be a member of this House or the Senate during his continuance in it.

I believe it was a wise provision that prevented a member of the House or Senate from accepting a civil office created during the term for which he was elected or the emoluments of which may have been increased during such time; but it was not wiser than the provision that prevents the holding of two offices by a member of this House or the Senate.

The Constitution expressly and plainly disqualifies all Members and Senators during the time for which they have been elected for appointment to any civil office created or the emoluments of which have been increased during that time; and the Constitution as expressly and as plainly disqualifies all men holding any office under the United States from serving as a member of Congress while they continue in such office. The disqualification for appointment to offices created during the time for which Senators and Members are elected applies only to civil offices, but the disqualification for service as a member of Congress applies to all offices of the United States.

The object of such a constitutional inhibition was not merely to remove members of Congress from the temptations of Executive favors, but it was designed to enforce the theoretical separation of the several departments of Government. With the exception of the President and the Vice-President themselves, all other officers of the United States are appointed; and except a few inferior appointments which the courts of law may be authorized to make, all other appointments are made by the executive department. Our fathers easily perceived the absurdity of supposing that the legislative department could be kept independent of the executive department if members of Congress were permitted to accept and hold executive appointments while they continued members of the legislative department.

The question now under consideration appeals to me, and ought to appeal to all members on this side, with a double force. It not only unites in the person of one gentleman the diverse attributes of legislative and executive functions, but it blends civil and military authority. An officer in the Army of the United States is subject to the peremptory orders of the President, and as for my part, I will never consent to see any man continue as a member of this body who is compelled to obey the command of the President of the United States. The duties of a major-general are inconsistent with the duties of a Representative. It is not only impossible to perform them both at the same time, but in the nature of things they are liable to conflict.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman will allow me to ask, was not this question fully gone over by the Attorney-General and other authorities in the case of WILLIAM J. SEWELL, of New Jersey, who was appointed a major-general of volunteers while holding the position of Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BAILEY. It was. My position is not only in accordance with the Constitution and with the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, but it is in perfect accord with the precedents of this House itself.

Mr. GAINES. Suppose that enough members of Congress should join the Army to leave the House without a quorum, would the remainder of the House have the right to send out and arrest those men?

Mr. BAILEY. No; the governors of the States would order an election to fill the vacancies.

Mr. GAINES. Would there not be in that case a conflict of authority?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all. The Constitution provides that whenever a vacancy occurs in the representation of any State the executive thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies. That very case happened during the Mexican war. Mr. Yell, who was a member of this House from the State of Arkansas, accepted a commission as colonel in the Volunteer Army, and the governor of Arkansas, holding that Mr. Yell had vacated his seat in Congress, ordered an election and a Mr. Newton was elected.

Mr. GAINES. I agree with the gentleman as to what the law is and ought to be, but my question is this: Suppose enough members of the House should join the Army to leave the House without a quorum, would the remainder of the House have power to bring those men back from the Army?

Mr. BAILEY. They would not, because the moment those men join the Army they vacate their offices as Representatives.

The acceptance of an incompatible office always vacates another incompatible office. That doctrine is as old as the Constitution of the United States at least.

Recurring to the Arkansas case, it will be recalled that when Mr. Newton appeared here and asked to take the oath of office, Hon. George W. Jones, at that time, I believe, a Representative in Congress from the State of Iowa, moved to refer Mr. Newton's credentials to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The resolutions which Mr. Jones offered recited that the House was in possession of no information which indicated that the member from Arkansas, Mr. Yell, had become disqualified or had resigned his seat. The debate proceeded; but in the meantime some member had applied to the Adjutant-General's Office and procured the information that Mr. Yell had been commissioned as a colonel of volunteers in the service of the United States; and the Congressional Globe records that upon this fact being made to appear to the House all opposition was withdrawn and Mr. Newton was sworn in as a member of the House. Yet his only shadow of a right to his seat proceeded upon the theory that by accepting the colonelcy his predecessor, Colonel Yell, had vacated his seat in the House.

The resolution admitting Mr. Newton to his seat was passed without a division, and without a dissenting vote.

The question arose again in the case of Mr. Baker, of Illinois; and before it could be settled, as it would have been settled, Mr. Baker settled it by resigning. Yet the question was considered so important that the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which the Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, was chairman, reported that Mr. Baker had vacated his seat; and the report is published in the contested-election cases of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a very serious question might arise upon a state of facts suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES]. Suppose that this House should find itself without a quorum, and, in accordance with the rule, should order the arrest of all absent members. Does anyone believe that our Sergeant-at-Arms would have the right to go anywhere in this country, or out of it, and bring to the bar of the House a major-general of the United States Army?

No man believes it, and yet the applause with which the statement is received that no question ought to be made about a man's right to hold two offices in this country indicates that the House thinks it is consistent with the Constitution, with our laws, and with the public interest that the man who is chosen by his people to discharge his civil duties as a Representative may absent himself from the House and accept a commission in the Army. It is intimated, and the intimation is applauded, that it is unpatriotic to raise any question of that kind, because, forsooth, the member is at the front serving his country. I may applaud his military service, but while he is serving there he can not serve here. [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] as he may require.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how this question, which has been debated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], came up. I did not hear the origin of it. I can not see how it has any application to the question under consideration by the House; but it has come up, and is a very interesting question. And I want to say, and I do not hesitate to say, that I indorse every statement, every proposition, made by the gentleman from Texas.

I do not have any application in my mind to any particular gentleman who has seen fit to volunteer and accept office at the hands of the President. It is not alone on that side of the House. There is one case or more on this side of the House. I do not think any man's patriotism will ever be successfully called into question in the United States because he stands rigidly by the terms of the Constitution and carries out the manifest spirit and purpose of the Constitution. We formed a Government a great many years ago and have tried to adhere to its cardinal principles.

We undertook to separate into grand divisions the various component parts of the Government, and so we have zealously guarded the rights of the Supreme Court, the rights of the Executive, and the rights of Congress. And more than once the American people have expressed their approbation of the zealous care manifested that one branch of the Government should not trench upon the rights, privileges, and powers of the other branches of the Government. I was struck not many months ago by a remark made by a very distinguished American citizen holding a very high office, concerning which there was a little question of etiquette in what might be termed society, and he made a statement that impressed itself upon me when he said:

I care nothing about this question, so far as I am concerned; but while I hold this office I propose to protect its dignity and authority in every direction.

Now, I remember very well the debate upon this question in Congress during the last war. Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, a distinguished lawyer, a very able man—a very unsatisfactory politician to me and to a great many others—put this illustration on the floor of this Chamber: If one man can be commissioned by the President of the United States in the Army while holding the office of a Congressman and can take the oath to obey the lawful orders of the President of the United States, where is the limit? All of them might be commissioned, said Mr. Vallandigham. And the illustration is unanswerable. Under this tremendous call for troops every Congressman might have a commission in his pocket and be sworn to obey the orders of the President of the United States; and some day the President might get tired of the sessions of Congress and order these colonels and quartermasters and paymasters to join their regiments, thereby proroguing the Congress of the United States.

Mr. RAY of New York. They would all resign before they would go to the front.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from New York says they would all resign rather than go to the front. He speaks feelingly on that subject, I have no doubt. [Laughter.] The military arm of the Government is the power of the Executive. It is the weapon, the instrumentality of the President. The Congress of the United States is the representative power of the people of the country, and it ought to be kept as distinctly separate, the one from the other, as the courts and the legislative department ought to be, and I have no doubt that that is the true construction of the Constitution and the law. Now, what call therefore is there for any man to advertise his especial patriotism by saying that he is willing to vote that any man may have a leave of absence to go into the Army?

If anybody wants to go into the Army as a soldier, he had better do exactly as the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] did, just take his commission and go, and let the governor of his State take the responsibility of calling an election or not, as he may see fit. Nobody would obstruct General WHEELER. Nobody could obstruct him. He is an embodiment of the very spirit and incarnation of war, and I know as much about him in that respect as anybody on this side of the House.

And I want to say, now that I have spoken upon this question, that I should have regretted very greatly if he had put up his anxiety to hold the office of a Congressman here against his devotion to his country, for I believe he went forth in the spirit of unsullied and unalloyed patriotism. But there is no occasion for General WHEELER to violate any law of his country, nor is there any occasion for the Congress of the United States to hesitate to declare the law of the country, and the people of Alabama and the people of the United States will see to it that neither General WHEELER nor any other patriotic man will suffer by any sacrifice that he may have made in its behalf.

Mr. PAYNE. Right there, is it not a fact that General WHEELER considered himself no longer a member of the House when he accepted his commission?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think I had better make a little statement here. I believe it will be interesting to General WHEELER's personal friends. General WHEELER came into the Ways and Means Committee room on the morning that he had accepted his commission as a major-general, and the first thing he said when he came in—the committee was not in order and not transacting any business—he said in that nervous, quick way of his:

I have only come here to take a few papers out of my desk. I am not here to do anything as a member of the House. I have not even franked a document since I was appointed by the President.

Well, you know there could not be any higher demonstration of General WHEELER having left the House than that. [Laughter.] Presently somebody said, "Mr. Chairman, I think there is a quorum of the committee present." General WHEELER seized his papers and rushed out of the room, saying, "Don't count me," and that was the last word I ever heard General WHEELER say.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to remove from the statute books of the country and from the minds and hearts and consciences of the people of the country all distinction of citizenship growing out of the war of the rebellion of 1861 to 1865, so far as political rights and equality go. And, Mr. Speaker, if there is any one thing that will make a soldier feel grateful to Almighty God, it is that He has spared him to live to 1898; it is the fact that he has lived to see this condition come. [Applause.]

It was, as I said on another occasion, an imperfect sacrifice if complete salvation had not come of it. It was an imperfect sacrifice of the lives and property and limbs and health of the people of this country if out of that storm of blood and fire there had never come a perfect union, not a reunion by force, not a mere union upheld by the power of the courts and the Army, but, in the language of the poet—

A union of hearts and a union of hands,
A union of hearts none can sever.

Why should this remain? Is it to remain on our statute books to mark an epoch in our history that we would gladly forget, or if we would not forget, that we would certainly only remember now with pride, that out of it and from it has sprung the condition of to-day? Why, Mr. Speaker, there is not a country on the face of the earth, far or near, under king or potentate or republic, that has one-half the solid loyalty that is felt to the flag of this country by every human being that owes it allegiance. [Applause.]

Witness the marching of men, the zeal of these young men to go to war. It is said that some of the States of the Union have not filled their quota as rapidly as some other States of the Union. That must be understood by the American people as in no wise reflecting upon the zeal, purpose, and loyalty of the men who are in those States. The machinery for putting these men in motion was better in some States than in other States. The wonderful organization of the National Guard in some States that was ready almost at the instant to march is not to be put in evidence against the State that had no National Guard and had to form its organization out of the men on the farms and in the shops.

Why, in 1861-63 I can now recall regiments that began to organize for three years' service in the month of June and were not in the camps ready for battle until February or March of the next year. And yet we have 135,000 men drawn from the volunteer sources of the country ready to march to-day, with the exception of a very few of them that are not yet quite armed and equipped. We have learned something even in this war. We have learned something that we did not know, or, if we did know it, it fell as dead sound upon our ears.

We discovered when the tocsin sounded, when the cry was raised, that there were not rifles enough in the United States fit for use to have armed 20,000 volunteers, and there were not five rounds of ammunition for what cannon we had, let alone what has been added since. A demonstration made by a mighty people springing to arms, regardless of any question whether war might have been delayed, or ought to have been delayed—the spectacle of a mighty nation simply rising with the single battle cry, "My country, my flag," is a picture that all the world is looking at to-day with splendid admiration.

What is it that has changed the tone of the civilized world? What is it that is toning down the press of France? What is it that has touched that nation with something of the elements of republicanism? Why is it that the Czar is looking with friendly eyes over this way? It is because he and all the other nations of the earth have now learned for the first time that there is absolute loyalty in the breast of every American citizen, and it is the first time they have ever known it. [Applause.] So, standing here as I do in a humble way, representing a loyal constituency in the war and one of the loyal constituencies since the war, and with a heart grateful to Almighty God that I have had the opportunity, I will vote to remove from the statute book every vestige of this character of legislation, and I will try to forget that there was ever any necessity for it. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I concur entirely with the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa about the justice of passing this bill. The time has come—in fact it came long ago—when this should be done, and now there is no reason why it should be postponed longer. Strange anomalies have arisen growing out of the statute imposing political disabilities. I saw for ten years after I came to this House men who had been in the Union Army go up and take the ironclad oath and those who had been in the Confederate army take the modified oath as members of Congress. They required a more strenuous oath of those that had been in the Union Army than those who had been in the Confederate.

I heard Senator Blackburn, then a member of this House, give utterance to sentiments that have just fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], expressed almost verbatim as he has expressed them. You take Senator Blackburn's speech made on the bill to prevent force at the polls, for which he was greatly criticised, and two sentences could hardly be framed, with any difference, more alike than the ones of the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Kentucky.

I rejoice to see the time when the discriminations growing out of that fearful conflict have passed. I shall vote for this bill with very great pleasure.

Mr. Speaker, I have in my humble, but rather long service in this House, helped to repeal the test oath; helped to remove the political disabilities of men of the South; helped repeal the laws authorizing troops and other Federal forces at the polls, and rejoice that I have been spared to this good work of removing this last law on the subject from the statute books.

One other matter to which reference has been made. The gentleman whose action as an officer and soldier has been under discussion I met in this Hall when I first came here; and if I have had other than twenty years of friendship and admiration for him, I might afford to remain silent and let the presumption arise that would arise in his behalf from all who know him. Knowing him as I do, watching him as I have watched him, seeing his coming and his going for so long a period, I would do myself injustice did I not say to this House, what this House already knows, that never during his history will there be found a single action on the part of General WHEELER that indicates that it was ever possible for him to hold any office or desire to hold any in violation of the Constitution of his country.

A braver man does not live, a more patriotic man can not be found; one more unselfish and devoted to the good of his country is not to be found anywhere. For one I will not directly or indirectly question by any words of mine a single motive that actuates him, or casts suspicion upon any conduct of his that he could possibly do other than the patriotic thing, nor will in silence hear it done.

The gentleman from Ohio has hit the point. As much as my friend from Texas, who addressed you a few moments ago, be-means a man going out and leaving a seat in this House vacant that ought to be filled, he knows that the Constitution, which he and I both revere, and which General WHEELER will always bow before and defend, puts it beyond the power of this House to have any voice as to when the vacancy may be filled. That is for the governor of Alabama and the people of Alabama to say, and not for any member of this House. This House can not move in that matter. Has General WHEELER done any act that indicates that he proposes to play a dual part, in an official way, as a member of this House while holding a military position?

Has he in committee? Has he on the floor? Has he in connection with the drawing of his pay? Not one. And, for me, I would as soon go to the desk of one whose desk has been made vacant by his death in the service of his country and remove the black drapery and the flowers from it as to question the right that pertained to him concerning that seat while he was out fighting the foes of the United States.

For one I would not—and I do not believe any other man on this floor would—ever be found following on his trail and questioning his motives at the time that he was being shot at by the fiery Spaniards who are at war with the people of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I have felt that I was not only justified in saying this much, but that I would do myself injustice if I did not say it for one who is absent and can not speak for himself. Let us go forward transacting the business before us, providing for the enlistment of men, their equipment and feeding. Let us attend to our own business. Sir, that able and distinguished soldier will do his duty in the field. Let us do ours and be content therewith.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, while I was on the floor before I carefully and purposely avoided calling any names. The only reason I took the floor originally was to correct the gentleman from Iowa, who had inadvertently, no doubt, stated that the House had granted General WHEELER leave of absence. I felt that a correction ought to be made, because if the statement were correct, it would follow that in asking for a leave of absence, General WHEELER asserted his rights as a member of the House, and in granting it the House had recognized him as still a member of it and entitled to all of its privileges.

I interposed in order that that statement might not appear unchallenged in the RECORD. I stated that the House had granted no leave of absence and added that it would not do so with my consent. I offered no further explanation, but everybody understood that the reason I made that statement was that I held, in common with everyone else here, that an acceptance of a position in the Army by a member of the House vacates his seat.

If we are to believe the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] and the gentleman from Ohio, General WHEELER himself holds the same opinion, because one says he would not hold both offices, and the other says he has carefully and scrupulously avoided attempting to exercise since accepting his position in the Army the rights of a member of this House.

I am not advised whether he has notified the governor of Alabama that his seat is vacant, and I make no criticism in that respect; that is a matter between him and his constituents, or perhaps between his constituents and the governor of his State. But I am interested in seeing that this House does not recognize the right of any of its members to accept and hold an office of the United States while they continue as members of this body.

No man exceeds me in admiration for General WHEELER both as a soldier and as a civilian. Though I have not served so long with him as the gentleman from Tennessee, I have served long enough to respect him. No man exceeds me in admiration for his courage and his military talent; and if he had asked my advice I would have told him to abandon the service of his country in this House in order that he might serve it where few can serve it so well.

I feel sure that when the war is over the reputation which he made in that unhappy war between the States will not only be undiminished, but will be increased; and I know that no man who wears the uniform which is now the emblem of a reunited people will keep it more stainless than General WHEELER. [Applause.] But much as I admire him, if he were my brother I would not recognize his right while serving his country upon the field of battle to continue his membership in the House of Representatives.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Speaker, I think when the permanent RECORD of this day's session is made up it would be incomplete indeed if some Representative from the South, some man who is supposed to be in sympathy with the Southern people in their present and their past relations to the General Government, did not avail himself of the opportunity to respond to the generous sentiments that have been uttered on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentlemen from Iowa and Wisconsin in the conduct of this bill to-day, for notwithstanding we may all say this is a just bill and ought to have become a law years ago, yet we from the South must agree that it is none the less a generous bill; and Southern Representatives should not hesitate so to declare in their places here, for had we been the victors we might not have been so generous as they.

This bill is but the culmination of the course of events that have been gradually approaching this point for ten or fifteen years past. I have seen it in the present session. I have heard the great battle hymn of the South—"Dixey"—receive as generous applause in Northern capitals as was accorded to the "Star-Spangled Banner" and "Marching Through Georgia." And it came not from Southern sympathizers, but from the generous people of the North, who took that occasion to say, in this way, to their brethren at the South, "We embrace you and have learned to forget all past differences." [Applause.]

I happened to be at a down-town theater the other evening. In the interval between the acts it has become the custom not to go out, but to remain and hear the orchestra discourse patriotic anthems and airs. After the band had ceased playing some gentleman arose and proposed "Three cheers for McKinley." The vast audience gave them with a will. Then three cheers were proposed for Dewey, the hero of Manila, which were also responded to. And then some gentleman, whom I took to be a military officer of rank, arose in his place, and waving his hand in the air said, "Three cheers for a united country!" Gentlemen, that sentiment caught me; and it caught that vast house. [Applause.]

I thank God that I have lived to see this day. We sometimes thought that the great war between the States was an unmitigated evil, but in the providence of God it, accompanied by other agencies, has proved to be a great blessing. That war was not of chance or of accident. It came as the winds come and as the storms come and as all things else come—in response to the eternal purposes and behests of Him who "holds the wind in His fist and the hearts of men in the hollow of His hand." [Applause.]

The beginning of the war was the acme of that sectional hate which had been growing and increasing in bitterness for thirty years. The North had no love for the South, and the South had no respect for the North. The conflict was irrepressible. The world looked on at the magnificent display of courage and fortitude exhibited through four years of battle and strife, and while one rebel could not, as he thought at the beginning, wipe out five "Yankees," the sequel showed that he could put them to considerable exertion. [Laughter and applause.]

When valor and courage and endurance shall no longer command the praise of men, when tribute shall be denied to those who endured privation without complaint and suffered all manner of sacrifices without murmur, then we might hesitate to unroll the curtain of that past and let its scenes pass in panorama before us. But Heaven forbid in this day, when one touch of nature has made us all akin, that I should fear in this presence to hold up for admiration the prowess of the gallant boys in the trenches and the field, wearing the blue or wearing the gray, who gave to the cause of their country their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. [Applause.]

But the end came at last. These Southern knights went down to their home, and many of them can not be reached by any provision of earthly statute now.

Many of those good knights are dust—
Their good swords rust,
Their souls are with the saints, we trust.

They went down to their desolated homes and despoiled fields, and without complaint they set about the task, the herculean task, of rebuilding those waste places and restoring their ancient splendor. Her sons laid down their arms in good faith, and in the same spirit they laid their hearts upon the altar of their country and took their step to the music of the Union. I do not believe, gentlemen, that the American people were ever so united as they are to-day. The men who stayed at home were the last to forgive, but the men who fought have always been the first to forget. [Applause.]

And now we are hastened to this era of good times by the war in which we find ourselves involved. We shall free Cuba, but we shall do more than that. We shall free ourselves. The greatest of English poets, in speaking of the divine quality of mercy, has said that—

It is twice blest:
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes.

If we shall confer a gracious boon upon the people of that unhappy island, we shall receive a blessing from Heaven, such perhaps as we may not be able to contain. Out of this baptism of fire and blood wherewith we are now being baptized we shall come forth, I doubt not, new men and new women, clean every whit, with sectional hate and sectional bitterness clean gone forever. [Applause.]

That were a consummation devoutly to be wished; that were the summum bonum, the great desideratum; that were well worth all the treasure we may expend and all the blood that may be shed. In the language of the great Kentucky editor, this war has already forever eliminated the sectional contest. There are thousands of old Confederates who are to-day happy in the thought that before they have been called to join the silent bivouac of the dead, they have seen the North and the South united in battle array beneath the Stars and Stripes.

Flag of the free heart's hope and home!
By angel hands to valor given!
Thy stars have lit the welkin dome,
And all thy hues were born in heaven.

[Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee that reported this bill unanimously, it is with reluctance that I deal but for a moment with considerations that do not belong in this debate, although so earnestly and so well urged by the gentleman who has just taken his seat. Whether a member of Congress is so incapacitated from going to fight for his country that thereby he forfeits his seat is probably a question for each particular case and to be determined upon each particular case. No doubt he is not a member of Congress while he is in the field. No doubt he does not serve and can not serve in both offices. No doubt he can not draw both salaries. No doubt his office—for office is service—is suspended.

But whether it is finally vacated is a question that ought not be determined in a mere incidental debate and by incidental construction of a great clause of the Constitution in hurried remarks on the floor. The practical questions are not simple. The instances are many and complicated.

The Constitution says that no person holding any office shall be a member "during the continuance of such office." Does this apply to an attorney of the United States Supreme Court? Does he hold an office under the United States? Does a United States commissioner or a master in chancery hold an office under the United States? Take a larger question, not based on exact words of the Constitution, but on general constitutional principles. Chief Justice Jay, of the Supreme Court of the United States, was not held to forfeit his office as Chief Justice by going as an ambassador of the United States to England with special powers and privileges to negotiate a treaty, and thereby becoming part of the executive and diplomatic service of the United States.

It is a still closer question whether a member can serve in the militia of a State. By the Constitution Congress is given power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining that militia, and governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers. Is not an officer of militia an officer of the United States as well as of the State? Is he such an officer as incapacitates him from holding his seat here, as many a colonel and as many an officer of the National Guard has done? Some may say that he is not an officer of the United States till he is called out and into the service of the United States. Admit this. Then, if for a short time and during recess of Congress an officer of militia goes out at the call of the President to put down a riot which may be ended in a week or a month, does he thereby and ipso facto forfeit and vacate his place in Congress? Or does he merely make it liable to vacation?

Now, Mr. Speaker, the constitutional provision on this point is very careful. It is not like the English law. It is not copied therefrom, as has been claimed here. By the English law if a member of the House of Commons shall accept any office of profit from the Crown during his membership, his election—

Shall and is hereby declared to be void, and a new writ shall issue for a new election as if such person so accepting was actually dead: Provided, That such person shall be capable of being again elected, as if his place had not become void as aforesaid. (1707, 6 Anne., cap. 7, XXVI.)

Thus by that law the very fact that the member accepts the office creates a vacancy in his seat as member of Parliament, and a new writ of election is ordered to issue. The statute itself creates the vacancy, forfeits the office, and orders the new election. Yet even this statute has been so strictly construed that if a man be already an officer of the army, the acceptance of a higher commission—a new office of profit and trust—is held in the English Parliament itself not to forfeit his place.

Our own provision creates no such summary process.

Mr. Speaker, the framers of the Constitution saw that on such great constitutional questions practical common sense in each case should govern. They declared a principle. The evil was in holding and trying to fulfill two offices. "During the continuance" of the military office, while in the service of the United States, the man can not be a member. He can not act as such. What is more, a statute of the United States declares that if any officer of the Army shall perform the functions of any other office, elective or otherwise, he shall thereby forfeit his place in the Army. And therefore General WHEELER could not do anything as a member of Congress without forfeiting his place as a major-general in the Army.

But whether his acting as major-general in the Army vacates his seat or only suspends his office and functions, whether it ipso facto orders a new election or is such temporary employment as is consistent with the duties of a citizen and therefore only gives a discretion to order a new election, and meanwhile only suspends his service as member while otherwise employed, are questions which we at this time are not called upon to decide. I now only answer some general statements that have been made here, agreeing thoroughly with the rule that no man can act at the same time as a member of the Legislature and as a member of the Army of the United States; reserving the great question whether the seat is ipso facto forfeited and a new election necessary when a member accepts other service under the United States, however temporary, or whether a practical discretion is reserved to this House or to the governor of the State to declare whether the member's absence in other employ, perhaps necessary, patriotic, and temporary, in the particular case, under the particular circumstances, and as a practical question, shall be deemed a mere suspension of service or treated as cause for ordering a new election.

Something has been said about the decision of the Attorney-General of the United States. When it was attempted to submit that question to him, with reference to a Senator from my own State, I know from the best authority that the Attorney-General properly declined to decide that question, on the ground that it was for the Senate itself to decide whether a seat be vacant or not.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that such a question as this, with even a suggestion as to the position of members of this House in the presence of a common danger, should have been injected into this debate. We are unanimous upon this bill. After thirty-three years, the length of a generation, one-third of a century, South and North stand together against a common foe.

South and North vie with each other in thrusting party into the background, in putting everything behind them except the support of our common country. South and North will fight together, their regiments in the same brigades, upon a common battlefield. South and North will bear the hardships, which many do not expect now, but which may be incident to the contingencies of any war, whose blaze may kindle a conflagration such as we do not now expect. South and North, waving the one flag, the old flag of the Union, ask that all discriminations made necessary in the reconstruction period after the war shall now be removed, and that the equality of all men declared by the Declaration of Independence shall be restored under the flag of the Union. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I was attracted toward this discussion by observing what appeared to be some variance between two distinguished Democratic gentlemen, Mr. BALEY, of Texas, and Governor McMILLIN, of Tennessee, who both occupy high places in the esteem of the nation and in the respect of this House. If I might be permitted to paraphrase the utterance of one of these gentlemen a short while since, when Col. AMOS CUMMINGS, of New York, and myself engaged the attention of the House, I would say that I deeply regret that a "difference should appear among the minority side, lest it shall go to the country at large as some evidence that there is a serious division in our ranks," whereas as a matter of fact the roll call would simply show that two distinguished gentlemen have fenced for epaulets each deserves to wear. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the present bill under consideration can necessarily concern me only as a sentiment. Gentlemen who have preceded me have been those who by experience and by association well know the fitness of this measure. I did not, like the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], have either personal acquaintance or personal experience in that great strife of our nation, which shall go down in the immortal history of the world. That contest of a mother's children—one dying for his home, the other for his country.

For these, where'er they be,
Where'er they sleep,
Glory treads with eternal round,
And honor's vigil watch will keep.

[Applause.]

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], like Dentatus, has grown gray in the service of his country, and for the silver locks he bears as the crown of his reward we who differ from him nevertheless respect him. I, Mr. Speaker, during this period of conflict, was a crooning infant, lulling my life away on the black bosom of my own negro mamma. The thunder of the cannon did not disturb me, the conflict of brother men battling to death did not awake me. To me life was serene and full of joy. It was not until I reached some manhood that I could to any extent appreciate what had been the extent of the strife. As I turned my eyes to the home of my childhood I observed all that were the household gods of my people had been laid low in the ashes of war.

I could not be expected to express any other sentiment than as one who represents this new and approaching generation—this generation of good will to men. I come into this honorable House as one of those who represent that generation who have been born and reached the manhood and fulfill it to the best of their capacity, those who bear no hatred and harbor no revenges to our brothers in our midst. Let me dream that in the glory and the consummation that is ever reaching the apex of pleasure and usefulness the relics of this internecine strife has to-day been wiped off the statute books of the country by the patriotic hearts of the American people in an American Congress before the eyes of the admiring world. [Applause.]

I rise, however, Mr. Speaker, to make note of a single incident. I do not vote myself able, and I would not assume to add anything to the eloquent tributes which have fallen from the mouths of the different gentlemen here. I would not mar the grace of the occasion by the crude attempt. If it were not that I had a purpose particularly addressed to the wisdom of this House, I would not otherwise have intruded myself to disturb its harmony in any respect.

But, Mr. Speaker, when I hear distinguished gentlemen, such as the respected soldier, scholar, and statesman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], such as the eminent jurist from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], as the noble Roman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], speaking so eloquently and magnanimously upon the unity which has come upon the land, who deprecate any utterances that are to be made in a partisan spirit or upon political conditions in an hour like this, I can not but recur to the record there is in front of me and ask myself the question, in the language of the bard:

And be these juggling fiends no more believ'd,
That palter with us in a double sense;
That keep the word of promise to our ear
And break it to our hope.

In the Washington Post, a reputable paper, which at least can be regarded as an expression of the views of the present Administration, I read, Mr. Speaker, what purports to be a quoted utterance of the secretary of the Republican Congressional campaign committee, a respected member of this House. In this fulmination, which it was his purpose to circulate throughout the country from the central point, in order that it would have such political effect in the campaign—the utterance as official—I read, among other things, this:

When the fifty-million-dollar appropriation was authorized—

Mr. HANDY. I should like to have order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The House will be in order.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I read from a quotation by an eminent member of this House—let me hope him more eminent than these declarations would prove him—the present secretary of the Republican Congressional campaign committee—

Mr. GAINES. What is his name?

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. OVERSTREET, a member of Congress from Indiana, representing the commercial city of Indianapolis, the secretary of the Republican campaign committee. Among other utterances which went forth and which were intended to be circulated throughout the country for effect, this gentleman, in his official capacity as secretary of the Republican campaign committee, said:

When the fifty-million-dollar appropriation was authorized, a great number of Democrats took occasion to pledge the support of the people of their States for the aid of the nation, and in eloquent terms declare their intention to stand by the flag and furnish all the men necessary from their respective States. Our people have observed that in the call for volunteers there is hardly a State whose Democratic Representatives so eloquently pledged their people to the cause that has furnished its quota under the call.

These things simply demonstrate that when the war shall end (as it now looks that it may before a great while) the advocates of the free coinage of silver will immediately urge consideration of their claims, and the battle of 1896 will be repeated in 1898. In my judgment, such has been the development of business since 1896, demonstrating the fallacies of the Bryanites, that the battle of 1898, while it may be waged with apparent earnestness on the part of the free silverites, will not be as dangerous as it was in 1896.

Appearances strongly indicate decided Republican gains throughout the central West, and such States as Kansas and Nebraska are rapidly swinging away from their Populistic principles and arranging to return to the Republican fold. I firmly believe that the Republicans will be able to hold their majority in Congress and will make some decided gains in the central Western States.

Mr. Speaker, as I stated, I took no part in the last war. I make free to assert here to-day that the distinguished gentleman who gave utterance to these remarks had no greater experience and from it never bore a scar. That he, like myself, because of being in infancy, had no opportunity in that conflict, and that these utterances, so unbecoming at this hour, which are so untrue to the truth, so lacking in magnanimity, so wanting in patriotism, would never have been born from the hearts of such distinguished gentlemen as I have named heretofore and who were a part of that combat of blood and death, nor would they have issued from any considerate patriot in a time like this.

I would not have believed that any man could have grown so small as to have made this unjust and calumnious charge against these States for no other reason than, as he claims, they profess to be Democratic in politics. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What purpose have these States to decline to fill their quota? What is the object insinuated by the gentleman as theirs in refusing to fill their quota? Where is the single evidence of truth or instance of fact to verify this charge or excuse its utterance? I answer there is not the existence of either.

Sir, those sentiments are defined in the language of a poet:

It is a shrill shriek. It is a craven croak from out of a narrow throat—
The craven croak from a narrow throat,
Born of a dry and dusty heart—
The grovelling of beast, but of man no part.

[Applause.]

We ask ourselves, Where is the exhibition of that magnificent patriotism often vaunted in eloquent speech? In display before the public there never was an occasion that was so vulgarly corrupted, so thoroughly distorted, and so unjustly made use of as this public announcement by this public official in his public capacity, sending forth this public slander upon every State that has professed Democracy in politics or gave its vote against the present Administration in the last campaign. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GAINES. Does he sign that publication as secretary?

Mr. STEELE. I invite attention—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I do.

Mr. GAINES. No patriot would sign such a document.

Mr. STEELE. I do not know whether the article is to be attributed to my colleague—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. STEELE. But I want to call attention to the fact that he is not now in the House.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, before being requested to do so, I had yielded to my honorable friend, Mr. STEELE, from Indiana.

Mr. Speaker, apropos of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Indiana, I have this to say: I realize that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] is not now in his chair, and lest my remarks be misunderstood, let it now be known that my criticisms in his absence are upon the sentiment. Upon his return I shall treat them as from him as an official. I have endeavored to make it very clear that as the gentleman was not in his seat I restricted my strictures and criticisms wholly to the expression, it matters not from what source it comes. That it could have found its way into public print, that any newspaper could have given it wings of circulation and sent it broadcast over the land, emanating as such from the secretary of the Republican campaign committee, a distinguished member of this House, is what I condemn.

It is this expression to which I wish to call the attention of honored members of this House, that they may know that while in eloquent terms they profess the kindest feeling in this matter, while they declare that they would wipe out in this country every line of partisanship—that they would brush away every spirit that demarks political differences—while they thus profess in glowing terms in this House their era of good feeling, their ministerial and executive officers in charge of their campaign are setting forth throughout the country these charges that the Democracy of the country, notwithstanding their professions of loyalty and zeal for the defense of the country, have deliberately declined to furnish their quota to the defense of the nation. Sir, mark the utterance, "Our people;" the Republican party, observe. Sir, the party does not observe; no such vision exists.

Sir, why is this charge made at the outset? It is made for the purpose of leading the country to believe that the Democratic party—the States which are Democratic—are not true to the cause which we now have at stake. It is made as an accusation that those who are Democrats profess a loyalty they neither believe nor are prepared to execute. It is made to carry with it the conviction throughout the nation that we who are Democrats have declined to give to the President for the aid of the nation the quota of men allotted to us—the quota which it was our duty as patriots to furnish and our honor in the execution of our proposed contracts to supply. It had no other purpose. It is a manifest injustice. It is an open and glaring slander.

And, Mr. Speaker, amid all the professions of kindly feeling one to another—amid all the declarations of desire on the part of gentlemen who are most distinguished and honorable in this House, to avoid all such sentiments as these, I have not heard one of my friends on the other side either disown the sentiment or condemn it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, it is true that in some of the States of this Union some of the quotas have not all been filled. For the South—the States which are more generally known to be Democratic—I do not assume to speak a word of defense, because the South has such valiant and honored Representatives on this floor who on so many occasions have given indisputable evidence of their capacity and zeal and love for their country as well as determination to guard the interests of their section. They can speak for their mother land.

I shall be content in the few moments I am to occupy to turn my attention to that portion of the country for which, by the certificate of the people, I have a right to speak—I mean the West, my own State, the State of Washington, so far west that it seems as if it were the very lap on which the sun pillows herself when tired after a day's journey [applause], so far from the comprehension of my fellow-members here that they little understand her conditions and less appreciate her situation.

It may be, sir, that California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, and Idaho have not, to some degree, been able to equip their quotas, but to say they have not furnished it—have refused to furnish it—is a slander. [Applause.] But at the outset, sir, the men Washington has sent to the conflict, in proportion to her population, in proportion to their means, certify to their loyalty to a greater—aye, a far greater—degree than similar expressions which have come from any other State of the Union, and I respect them all and the offerings they have brought to the flag. [Applause.]

If it be true that these States have failed to furnish their complement to the Army, what excuse shall we find? Shall any man charge those States with lack of loyalty? Shall it be said that they lack patriotism? Shall it be charged by any man that while professing loyalty to the Constitution and devotion to the flag they bided their time to prove treacherous to their vows? Any such charge, I repeat, is a calumny. No States in this Union suffered in the last five years, as the result of the financial panics in this country and the grip of monopoly, as the States of the Pacific, the State of Washington.

Power and the oppression of masters have corrupted my State as most of the West, and borne heavy indeed upon all those States new in the Union, drawing their life from the soil. Their farming products were reduced in the market, the wages of their laborers cut down, their commerce stifled, their shipping interests shackled. These States were merely rising out of this unhappy condition and asserting their natural advantages when the war came upon them. Before the revival it was with most of them a question whether they would make appropriations to educate their children that they might not go through the avenues of life in ignorance and want, or apply the fund to equipping the guard. The soldiers were the sons of the State. They it was who had to be educated and protected in the enjoyment of statehood. Our people had not possessions rich enough to do both as they would have loved to do. They were forced to choose to which they would apply their limited contributions.

They have been compelled to await the repair of the losses brought upon them by no wrong of their own. And now to be slandered and defamed from high quarters, as have these Western States, is a crime! But this fact gives no warrant or authority or license to publish to the world, to circulate among the nations of the earth, the slanderous statement that we who profess to be the Democratic party stand on the floor of this House and in the hour of the nation's travail pledge her the aid and security of our defense, the loyalty of our honor, the sinews of all our resources, and that, in spite of that pledge, when our country moves to the conflict with a common enemy, we but wait until the hour of trial to smite her with the treachery of a promise unfulfilled. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The man or men who would give utterance to any such cowardly sentiment, whether he be high executive or a subaltern, must expect from a just mankind severe condemnation. If it be true that this utterance has emanated from an honored member of this House, let us all hope that the justice of his people is such that they will rise up and condemn his accusation and repudiate the author. [Loud applause.]

Sir, I can hardly credit the calumny as worthy; I can not credit it as authentic. Therefore, I would utter nothing personal against the gentleman from Indiana.

I hope that my utterances are well understood by those who applaud to apply to the sentiment—it matters not from what source it may come, whether from a newspaper or from an individual high in office or low in respectability. And while I join most heartily and to the extent of my power in advocating unanimity and harmony on the floor of this House for all purposes that may look to the defense of our common country, might I not ask you, my Republican friends, one question? Can you conceive of anything that will work more quickly to discouragement, that will cast a shadow more darkly upon those who have suffered most yet who are sacrificing most, than to have them understand that, notwithstanding in the hour of their agony they make tender of both treasure and life to their country, laying everything down at the staff of the flag, are to be slandered and insulted as their reward?

Sirs, behold how our poor, rich—low and high—went out from my dear young Commonwealth, not waiting for equipments, not knowing of free special cars or favors of rich endowments, clad in the mixed habiliments of civil and military life, business given up, families consecrated in the hour of affliction to the charity of friends. These who go to lift and support the arm of the naval hero of the earth, the immortal Dewey [applause], to the dangerous Tropics, fraught with dread disease and possible death—they have all gone. They knew but one creed; it was our country. They sang but one song—the flag. Daring to do and willing to die, young Washington sent her children to glory, and to-day commands the respects and salutes of the Union of America. [Applause.]

I warn you, gentlemen, if I may be pardoned that utterance, that it is not sufficient to say that these utterances are thoughtless utterances. If they came from any man on this Democratic side of the House, eminent gentlemen on that side would have risen and justly excoriated the author, while bitterly condemning the expression. Might I not ask, then, that in the campaigns which are to be waged, in the utterances which are to fall from the mouths of men who occupy places upon this floor, we may not have that sentiment and exhibition of the principle of friendship on the one hand, while on the other the open declaration goes to the nation from your agents of the charge of treachery against us?

I would that the sentiments of loyalty, the sentiments of friendship, the sentiments of a great unity so beautifully expressed were a living fact, were illustrated in the deeds and words of these distinguished gentlemen, and that we should not longer or again witness an exhibition such as this, where a distinguished member on the floor, or a distinguished public official of this country, is found saying to the nations of the earth that out of this whole great column of humanity which professes devotion to the cause of the Union there are those who in the hour of our trial proved traitors, and that they were those who were the Democrats and States which were Democratic States.

I for one join in the hope—I dream, too, of the day when there shall be but one Union—one union of hearts as well as of country. I would greet the hour, in the language of Victor Hugo, when mankind would know but one religion, that of love for all fellow-men, and when out of the strifes of this world mankind should know but one pursuit, and that the alleviation of the distresses of mankind, and mankind know but one hope, and that hope Heaven. [Applause.] If this can be brought about through the regenerated affections of mankind, when the line of political demarcation has been wiped out of existence, and hands have been clasped across the real or imaginary chasm of differences among men, I say, God speed the hour and day that will perpetuate the glory of that glorious reign. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to change the provisions of section 3 of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which section 3 is as follows:

SECTION 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

The provision of this bill is simple, and is as follows:

That the disability imposed by section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States heretofore incurred is hereby removed.

That is the simple question before us. This bill passed the United States Senate on the 12th day of May last. It was referred to House Committee on the Judiciary on the 15th of May. I referred it to a subcommittee of which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] is chairman, because he was a Union soldier. That subcommittee at once reported it back unanimously, recommending the provision that I have read. It was considered at the next regular meeting of the full Committee on the Judiciary, and passed that committee without one dissenting vote, and was reported to the House on the 24th day of May.

We have waited a few days for a call of the committee in the House to bring it up and pass it, and concluded this morning to ask unanimous consent, which was given by the entire House, and the bill is before us. If this shall pass, as I believe it will, if it becomes a law, which I believe it will, it will only record upon the statute books what has been recorded in the heart of every American citizen for many years past. Now is a time when there should be but one thought on this question.

Those who fought for the Union, fought for the Union and to keep our country together. We are now together, and the terrible opportunities of this summer have given all their chance to testify their genuine feelings in that regard. I only want to say that the statement which I have made indicates the views of the committee reporting it, and that I hope when this vote is taken it will not be passed by a simple two-thirds vote, but that it will pass without a single dissenting voice. In saying this I believe I express the sentiment of this entire country. [Applause.]

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to call the attention of the House to one matter related to the subject which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS] has so thoroughly discussed. I do not wish to say one word that could add to party feeling or party bitterness. On the contrary, I hope what little I shall say will have the opposite effect. I certainly have the opposite purpose. I had observed this newspaper interview with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], but I had failed to observe that it came from him in any official capacity.

My attention has been called to that for the first time by the remarks of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS]. I had supposed that when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] gave utterance to those views, he was expressing his own individual opinions and not attempting to repeat them to the country as the opinions of any other person or any other set of persons. The views themselves, Mr. Chairman, are so thoroughly contemptible that I think the gentleman ought to shoulder the responsibility in person and not attempt to put it off upon even the committee of his party. I refer especially to the direct and positive statement the words of which I shall now read. After mentioning other points of interest to himself, he said:

Our people have observed that in the call for volunteers there is hardly a State whose Democratic Representatives so eloquently pledged their people to the cause that has furnished its quota under the call.

That is a statement so devoid of the truth, so utterly bald in its falsity, that it seems to me no member of this House who values the good will of the other members would be willing to allow it to go out to the country over his name. What are the facts? I hold in my hand statements purporting to have come from the highest possible authority on this subject, Adjutant-General Corbin. They are given under different dates. They are published in different papers.

And what now does he, the highest authority upon this subject, say upon this question of furnishing quotas? He says that all the States have practically furnished their troops, that there has been some little delay in the United States officers making proper examination and enlistment, that no State has been derelict, but that the three States which are behind—mark the names—are Iowa, North Carolina, and Mississippi. Iowa is a Republican State. North Carolina is a Republican State under a Republican governor, and Mississippi is the only one of the three States that is under Democratic control. It needs, Mr. Speaker, but the bare statement of these facts—

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield to an interruption?

Mr. FLEMING. It needs but the statement of these facts to show the absurdity and falsity of the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET]. Now, I do not mention this with any view of casting any reflection upon the State of Iowa, because I do not believe it deserves it. I simply name that State because it was mentioned in connection with the other two States as being the only three that were behind even in a technical sense, and General Corbin says that none of them are substantially behind.

Mr. LACEY. The fact is that the State of Iowa was called on for three regiments and raised four, and, having four, it made some difficulty about which three should be mustered in, and the delay was not because they did not have enough, but because they had too many. Now, I will ask my friend if he does not think that these constitutional questions that have been brought forward and the questions of politics that are being brought forward by some gentlemen here really have no proper place in this discussion this afternoon?

Mr. FLEMING. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is an explanation for Mississippi and there is an explanation for North Carolina equally as satisfactory as that which the gentleman has stated for Iowa, and which is thoroughly satisfactory to every man. General Corbin says that there is an explanation of a local character for every single one of them.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will my colleague permit me to say that in an interview with General Corbin, which I have in my desk and which was published in one of the local papers, it was stated that it was not the fault of the State authorities, but the fault of the enlisting officers of the United States.

Mr. FLEMING. I am quite sure that is a fact, and I only wish to emphasize it to show, as I say, the utter falsity and, I might say, the utter absence of all excuse for the gentleman from Indiana to attempt to make party advantage out of the situation by saying that hardly a single Democratic State had furnished its quota. The statement is false, and that is the proper reply to make to it. My own State of Georgia was among the very first to respond to the call.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman permit me just for a moment?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I think as a question of parliamentary privilege that such words as those should not be used with reference to gentlemen who are not here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The matter is entirely out of order, not being at all germane to the bill which is under consideration.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Speaker, I understand considerable latitude is allowed in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE in the chair). The attention of the Chair was not called to it before, but when it is called to it he holds that it is out of order.

Mr. FLEMING. I beg the pardon of the Chair. I thought we were in Committee of the Whole. If the point had been called to my attention, I would have stopped at once. I do not mention the subject for the purpose of criticising harshly any member of the House other than the one who is responsible for the statement.

Mr. CANNON. I did not interrupt the gentleman from Washington for obvious reasons, but I have watched the course of the gentleman from Georgia. The gentlemen are of different temper. Does not my friend from Georgia think this is a matter that would keep until the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] is present in the House? I have not read the interview—

Mr. FLEMING. I would much have preferred that the gentleman from Indiana were present.

Mr. GAINES. Nobody was present when he published the interview.

Mr. FLEMING. I would like to make this further remark. I will confine myself to the resolution before the House. I respond from the bottom of my heart to the higher and nobler sentiments just uttered in the discussion on this bill by the gentleman from Iowa, General HENDERSON. He has expressed the true sentiment of the patriots of this country. Those are the sentiments we reciprocate on this side of the House, which are dear to the people of all sections of the country, and I will gladly add my voice here and now to the acknowledgment of our appreciation. I never held any other gentleman or the Republican party responsible for the statements made by the gentleman from Indiana. My whole desire was to hold him responsible, and him alone.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desired to reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], but will wait until some time when, under the rules, I can make a proper answer to the alleged interview. I came into the House when the interview was under discussion and do not now know how the subject came up. I intended to speak in behalf of the State of Missouri, but as the point of order has been raised—and properly so, I think—I shall not pursue the discussion now, but will defer comment until we are in Committee of the Whole. I propose to identify the gentleman referred to, because I do not believe the Republican party or any committee of that party is responsible for any such utterance. I prefer to accept the declarations of the gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, and the gentleman from Iowa, General HENDERSON, as more truly reflecting the sentiments of the Republican party.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Has the gentleman from Iowa or the gentleman from Ohio, who have just spoken, made any reference to the interview of Mr. OVERSTREET?

Mr. DOCKERY. They have not.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, then, do you prefer to accept their statements when they have said nothing about it?

Mr. DOCKERY. Because the gentleman from Ohio stated to the House the reasons why certain States were behind in their quotas. I have been trying to get the notes of the reporter so as to read them in refutation of the statements of the alleged interview. I am loath to believe that the gentleman from Indiana made the statement—

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then why all this trouble to answer them when he is not present?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will answer them in due time, and when that time comes I shall put in evidence the statements of the gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, in reply.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am more than delighted with this resolution and with the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. It seems to me when it appears to this body that, without a dissenting vote, without any question at all being raised before that committee, this resolution receives the unanimous support of the committee that ought to satisfy every member of this body and every intelligent citizen of the United States—every one of them—that there is no tinge of hatred founded in the late bitterness between the sections now existing in any portion of these United States.

I thought we were going to have a love feast here to-day, and I was ready to join in a sort of a national hallelujah, until this question was brought into the discussion this morning. I am sorry it was brought in here. It has thrown a wet blanket over the meeting, and the gentleman ought not to have brought it in. My distinguished friend the gentleman from Washington, notwithstanding we always delight in hearing him, ought to have left that matter aside for the present.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Then it ought never to have been said.

Mr. LINNEY. How many things has the gentleman said that ought not to have been said on this floor? [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. If I am to be the judge of that, none.

Mr. LINNEY. Let me see whether you have or not. I can swear you and get a verdict that one-half you have said is wrong. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Not on my oath.

Mr. LINNEY. Yes, on your oath, my friend. In the late discussion we had here upon the appropriation bill and upon the efforts made to bring up the war resolution on the part of our Democratic brethren many hard things were said about the grandest man in the United States, President William McKinley, and you joined in them, did you not?

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. If I did, I have no desire to retract. But I want to say that I never said a hard or unjust thing against the distinguished gentleman, the President, on the floor of this House.

Mr. LINNEY. It was argued on the Democratic side that the President, because he preferred diplomacy to war, was under the influence of the bondholder. I have heard expressions of that kind, and the RECORD will sustain me in that statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that he confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. LINNEY. I shall confine myself to the bill, Mr. Speaker. What was said on this floor then was because of the excitement that then existed on the war question, and I am sorry the love feast is broken up by reference to what appeared in the Post, uttered probably under some excitement.

I want to say only one other thing, Mr. Speaker. I believe that every State in the Union is ready to do its full duty in this great contest. Allusion has been made to North Carolina failing to furnish her quota. Why, sir, in defense of North Carolina, I have only this to say: The State of North Carolina always does its full duty, in time of war or in time of peace. She not only furnishes troops, but she furnishes the best troops in the world. The first soldier who gave up his life in the late war between the States was a North Carolinian. The first who shed his blood in the war with Spain was a North Carolinian. And such was also the case in the war of the Revolution. Let me call attention to the sacrifice that State has recently made.

Worth Bagley stood amid the fire-flames of war at a period that tried men's souls; and amid the volleys of shot and canister from the strongholds of the enemy he had the cool, philosophic courage to utter expressions that none but the noblest heroes of the world could have uttered: "Throw me a rope! Heave the ship, boys! It is too warm for comfort here!" One moment afterwards off went the head of one of the grandest patriots and noblest soldiers of the United States. [Applause.]

The services of the citizen soldiery of North Carolina will place her standing as a State up to high-water mark. The example of Worth Bagley is the standard my State has set for courage and devotion to principle. We simply invite other States to come up to that standard. I have no doubt all the soldiers of all the States of the Union, from Mississippi to the State of my friend from Washington, will do all they can to come up to the high standard of Worth Bagley.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Washington will, you may depend upon it.

Mr. LINNEY. If so, then indeed will the war record of all the States be glorious. There are companies enough to make many regiments in North Carolina now anxiously waiting to enter the service. When they falter or stop, then the war will stop.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I can and will support this measure very heartily. The only thing I regret is that it has been so long delayed. It should have passed many years ago. I am glad to be able to say that the State which I have the honor to represent in part recognized this principle several years ago. We had in the Halls of the Senate one of the ablest men in the United States; but, unfortunately for him, he thought the supreme duty of a statesman was to devote his time to skinning rebel brigadiers; and so, in pursuance of this policy, which we thought the best one and the just one, of recognizing that the war was over, we were forced to send him back to private life.

And finally, to emphasize this policy and to prove beyond question that Kansas, the State to start the war (as she did two years before the other States got into it), should be the first to recognize that the war was over, she sent a rebel brigadier to represent her in the Senate.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMPSON. With great pleasure.

Mr. HANDY. Is it a fact that the State of Kansas has at present a constitutional provision prohibiting any ex-Confederate soldier from voting in that State?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, unfortunately that is true. That is one of the war records that came down to us from the past.

Mr. HANDY. Why do you not repeal such a provision of your constitution?

Mr. BRODERICK. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. SIMPSON. I want to say, in answer to the gentleman from Delaware, that at present we have a Populist legislature and State government. In the last legislature we did undertake to repeal that constitutional provision, but it required a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BRODERICK. Now will my colleague allow me?

Mr. SIMPSON. In a moment I will yield to the gentleman. It required a two-thirds vote, and I am sorry to say that the Republicans in the legislature voted almost solidly against it. But I hope that now, in view of the spirit that is abroad, growing out of the condition in which the country finds itself, this wave of patriotism will strike even the Kansas Republicans, so that when the next opportunity is afforded they will see to it that this disgrace is wiped from the statute books of our State. I know that they will.

I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word in regard to the constitutional provision referred to by the gentleman from Delaware, which was enacted soon after the war. It imposed political disabilities, as has been stated, but provided that those disabilities might be removed at any time by a two-thirds vote of the legislature. And I never heard of a bill being presented in the Kansas legislature asking the removal of the political disabilities incurred on account of service in the Confederate army that was not passed. If there has ever been such a bill defeated in the legislature of that State or opposed by any considerable number I never heard of it.

Mr. SIMPSON. I think that is true.

Mr. BRODERICK. I think those disabilities have been removed from all who desire it.

Mr. SIMPSON. But in the removal of such disabilities each individual must be named separately; and to my personal knowledge there are very many persons in the State who served in the Confederate army whose disabilities have not been removed. But, as I said before, I hope the spirit of patriotism which is at large will at last reach the State of Kansas, so that the constitutional provision to which I have referred may be repealed.

Mr. HANDY. As I understand the situation, if, on the conclusion of the war with Spain, General WHEELER should settle in Kansas, instead of Alabama, he could not vote there unless his disabilities were removed by a special act of the legislature.

Mr. SIMPSON. A special bill would have to be passed to relieve him of his disabilities, which I have no doubt would be done at once, according to the practice which my colleague has stated.

Mr. Speaker, I have been drawn into these remarks reluctantly. I did not want to have any politics mixed up with this question—if this is politics. What I want to see done is that this bill be passed, so as to relieve these political disabilities and recognize the fact that the war between the States is over, as it was many years ago. This is a poor time now when the whole nation is rallying under the flag in the common defense of the country—this is a poor time to bring up those old reminiscences of the war. And let us see to it, as the gentleman from Iowa suggested, that we have a unanimous vote in support of this measure.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS] said something about a report coming from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] about some Democratic States being tardy in filling their quota. I want to say, in passing, that so far as the State of Kansas was concerned, she was the first State to fill the quota of her regiments and the first to muster them into the United States service, so that the gentleman's remark will not apply to the State of Kansas, which is under Populist rule. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say merely a word in answer to the question propounded a few moments ago by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] to my colleague [Mr. SIMPSON]. It is true that soon after the war, while sectional feeling ran high both in the North and South, the State of Kansas adopted an amendment to her constitution prohibiting persons who had served in the Confederate army, and also persons who served in the Union Army and had deserted, from voting or holding office until their disabilities were removed by the legislature of the State.

From time to time individuals who had served in the Confederate army and also individuals who had been in the Union Army and were charged with desertion applied to the legislature to have their disabilities removed, and I never heard of an instance in which such application was refused—not an instance. If there are to-day any residents of Kansas who are precluded from exercising the right of suffrage or from holding office because of their service in the Confederate army or because of their being charged with desertion from the Union Army, it is simply through their own fault in not having asked the legislature to relieve them.

There may be some isolated cases of persons laboring under those disabilities, but I do not know of any. In my part of the State there have been none for years, so far as I am informed. So the people of the State of Kansas will now heartily commend the action of her Representatives in voting to-day for this resolution. Kansas is as liberal as any State in the Union. We are willing that all disabilities that were imposed by the General Government or by any State government by reason of service in the Confederate army should be forever wiped out, and I am glad to have an opportunity to vote for this resolution. It is a grand thing that the spirit of patriotism which is now aglow is not confined to any section, but is sweeping over the entire country.

Mr. CANNON. I had no intention, Mr. Speaker, of saying a word about this bill. I shall vote for it cheerfully and heartily, and now only say a word or two, provoked by some remarks that have been made by some gentlemen upon the floor, prompted, as it seems to me, by a spirit that is not quite in harmony with the proposed legislation and with the occasion. This is our country. We all understand about and are proud of its history. We are proud to-day that perhaps we stand alone in history as a people who could have a conflict like unto that which we had in the late civil war and that all can be harmonized and forgiven in less than one generation.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. By the men living at the time.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. [Applause.] Why, there is the constitutional provision made just after the close of the war, and it is in pursuance of that provision that we pass this bill to-day. Yet some gentlemen arise in their places and criticize Kansas for having a provision, adopted about the same time, substantially similar to the constitutional provision of the United States. It is a wonder to me that there was not a stronger provision in the constitution of the State of Kansas, because it was upon the border during the civil war, and we recollect how that contest was waged. But in less than a generation all is forgiven.

Now, I think there will not be a vote against this bill in the House. I want to defend the constituencies of some gentlemen upon this floor against what seems to be the spirit of their present Representatives. I do not believe that the constituency of any man on this floor, pending the passage of this bill, will justify a gentleman in rising in his place and saying, with the hope of making partisan advantage, "You did not do this ten years ago," or "You did not do it twenty years ago."

I thank God that we can do it now. [Applause.] And if we remove all disabilities by this general act by unanimous vote, it seems to me that some gentlemen who apparently want to make a little political capital against individuals because it was not enacted earlier could perhaps forgive people for acts of omission or commission since the war when we are having this universal act of forgiveness and brotherhood written upon the statute book.

Now, that is all I want to say about it. I am proud of the bill, and proud of the state of feeling that will permit and demand its passage, and I congratulate this side of the House and congratulate that side of the House and the whole country upon its proposed passage. [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. Before the question is put, I want to ask unanimous consent to print a statement of the passage of the fourteenth amendment. It involves considerable labor. It is brief, and it will be of interest to anyone who wants to follow the history of the legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to print a statement in regard to the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. He desires consent to print a statement in regard to the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. JENKINS. Giving a history of its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to by Mr. JENKINS is as follows.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 14, 1868.

‡ Mr. Sherman submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

"Whereas the legislatures of the States of Connecticut, Tennessee, New Jersey, Oregon, Vermont, West Virginia, Kansas, Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Minnesota, New York, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Michigan, Nevada, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Nebraska, Maine, Iowa, Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina, Alabama, South Carolina, and Louisiana, being three-fourths and more of the several States of the Union, have ratified the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States duly proposed by two-thirds of each House of the Thirty-ninth Congress: Therefore, "Resolved by the Senate (the House concurring), That said fourteenth article is hereby declared to be a part of the Constitution of the United States, and it shall be duly promulgated by the Secretary of State as such.

"Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said resolution."

§ WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State of the United States.

To all to whom these presents come, greeting:

Whereas the Congress of the United States on or about the 10th of June, in the year 1866, passed a resolution which is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of both Houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

"ART. XIV. "And whereas by the second section of the act of Congress approved the 20th of April, 1818, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes," it is made the duty of the Secretary of State forthwith to cause any amendment to the Constitution of the United States which has been adopted according to the provisions of the said Constitution to be published in the newspapers authorized to promulgate the laws, with his certificate, specifying the States by which the same may have been adopted and that the same has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States; and

Whereas neither the act just quoted from nor any other law, expressly or by conclusive implication, authorizes the Secretary of State to determine and decide doubtful questions as to the authenticity of the organization of State legislatures or as to the power of any State legislature to recall a previous act or resolution of ratification of any amendment proposed to the Constitution; and

Whereas it appears from official documents on file in this Department that the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed as aforesaid has been ratified by the legislatures of the States of Connecticut, New Hampshire, Tennessee, New Jersey, Oregon, Vermont, New York, Ohio, Illinois, West Virginia, Kansas, Maine, Nevada, Missouri, Indiana, Minnesota, Rhode Island, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Massachusetts, Nebraska, and Iowa; and

Whereas it further appears from documents on file in this Department that the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed as aforesaid has also been ratified by newly constituted and newly established bodies avowing themselves to be and acting as the legislatures, respectively, of the States of Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina, Louisiana, South Carolina, and Alabama; and

Whereas it further appears from official documents on file in this Department that the legislatures of two of the States first above enumerated, to wit, Ohio and New Jersey, have since passed resolutions, respectively, withdrawing the consent of each of said States to the aforesaid amendment; and

Whereas it is deemed matter of doubt and uncertainty whether such resolutions are not irregular, invalid, and therefore ineffectual for withdrawing the consent of the said two States, or of either of them, to the aforesaid amendment; and

Whereas the whole number of States in the United States is thirty-seven, to wit: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, Maine, Missouri, Arkansas, Michigan, Florida, Texas, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, California, Oregon, Kansas, West Virginia, Nevada, and Nebraska; and

Whereas the twenty-three States first hereinbefore named, whose legislatures have ratified the said proposed amendment, and the six States next thereafter named as having ratified the said proposed amendment by newly constituted and established legislative bodies, together constitute three-fourths of the whole number of States in the United States:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, William H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United States, by virtue and in pursuance of the second section of the act of Congress approved the 20th of April, 1818, hereinbefore recited, do hereby certify that if the resolutions of the legislatures of Ohio and New Jersey ratifying the aforesaid amendment are to be deemed so remaining of full force and effect, notwithstanding the subsequent resolutions of the legislatures of those States, which purport to withdraw the consent of said States from such ratification, then the aforesaid amendment has been ratified in the manner hereinbefore mentioned, and so has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Department of State to be affixed. Done at the city of Washington this 20th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1868, and of the independence of the United States of America the ninety-third.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State. [SEAL.]

Also, petition of J. O. Banks, of Albion, Mich., protesting against certain provisions in the pending revenue-bond bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 2, 1898.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

On motion of Mr. FAULKNER, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

COMMODORE GEORGE DEWEY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

The resolution of Congress passed May 2, 1898, tendering to Commodore George Dewey, United States Navy, commander in chief of the United States naval force on the Asiatic station, the thanks of Congress and of the American people for highly distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy, as displayed by him in the destruction of the Spanish fleet and batteries in the harbor of Manila, Philippine Islands, May 1, 1898, and through him extending the thanks of Congress and of the American people to the officers and men under his command for gallantry and skill exhibited by them on that occasion, required the President to communicate the same to Commodore Dewey, and through him to the officers and men under his command. This having been done through the Secretary of the Navy on the 15th of May, 1898, the following response has been received, and is hereby transmitted to the Congress:

"I desire to express to the Department, and to request that it will be transmitted to the President and to Congress, my most sincere thanks for the great compliment paid to me."

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 1, 1898.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1910) conferring on the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to take proof of the execution of wills affecting real estate, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 175) for a survey of the harbor of Sheboygan, Wis.; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

EXECUTION OF WILLS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. FAULKNER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1910) conferring on the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to take proof of the execution of wills affecting real estate, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same amended as follows:

In section 8 of the proposed amendment, after the words "Provided, That," insert the word "in."

In the same section, after the words "orphans' court business," strike out the words "upon the petition of."

Insert a new section to stand as section 10, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. That the record in the office of the register of wills for the District of Columbia of a duly certified copy, or transcript of the record of proceedings, admitting any will or codicil to probate outside of the District of Columbia; and the record in said office of any will or codicil heretofore admitted to probate in said District, and which shall not have been annulled or declared void according to law prior to the passage of this act, shall be deemed and held, at law and in equity, as of the same and like force and effect as if such will or codicil had been duly proved and admitted to probate and record under and in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any proceedings at law or in equity pending at the date of the passage of this act, or commenced within one year after the passage of this act, wherein or whereby the validity of such will or codicil is or shall be called in question."

Number the sections consecutively.

And that the House agree to the same.

CHAS. J. FAULKNER,
LUCIEN BAKER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN J. JENKINS,
JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLEN. Let the proposed new section be read again.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state that the sole purpose of the provision is only to ratify what has always been the custom. For example, if the Senator from Nebraska should own property in this District and should die in Nebraska, and his will was probated in Nebraska, the probate of that will in Nebraska when certified here would be admitted to record in the District of Columbia. That is the sole purpose of the section.

Mr. ALLEN. It evidently has more force than that. The admission to probate of a foreign will is well provided for by the statutes of the different States, and the filing of a transcript of the probate of a will from one State to another State is well provided for. But this record seems to have a certain specific force given it.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state, if the Senator will permit me, that there is no force given to it that is not given by the Constitution and by virtue of the Constitution alone.

Mr. ALLEN. Probably that is true, but suppose a will were probated in the State of South Carolina and a transcript of the judgment were filed in the District of Columbia, and as a matter of fact the judgment in South Carolina was irregular and subject to certain proceedings for review and annulment, could those proceedings be brought here?

Mr. FAULKNER. No; they would have to be brought, under this provision, in South Carolina.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the filing of the transcript of the judgment stands as a lis pendens in this District until set aside in South Carolina?

Mr. FAULKNER. That is true.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think that is right.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator that that is the effect of every statute of every State that I have examined.

Mr. ALLEN. Let the section be read again, please.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the tenth section.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the record in the office of the register of wills for the District of Columbia of a duly certified copy, or transcript of the record of proceedings, admitting any will or codicil to probate outside of the District of Columbia; and the record in said office of any will or codicil heretofore admitted to probate in said District, and which shall not have been annulled or declared void according to law prior to the passage of this act, shall be deemed and held, at law and in equity, as of the same and like force and effect as if such will or codicil had been duly proved and admitted to probate and record under and in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any proceedings at law or in equity pending at the date of the passage of this act, or commenced within one year after the passage of this act, wherein or whereby the validity of such will or codicil is or shall be called in question.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no property in this District and I never expect to be unfortunate enough to have any, and I have no desire to die here; therefore I will let this matter go.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented the petition of D. W. Watson and 15 other citizens of Indiana, and the petition of Robert C. Rueff and 13 other citizens of Indiana, praying for the enactment of legislation to secure to the people of the rural sections of the country free rural mail delivery; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. TURPIE presented a memorial of the Dodge Manufacturing Company, of Mishawaka, Ind., remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 9815, appointing commissioners to revise the statutes relating to patents, trade and other marks, and trade and commercial names; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Liberty Assembly, No. 2315, Knights of Labor, of Fort Wayne, Ind., remonstrating against the issuance of bonds and praying for the coinage of the silver seigniorage now in the Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorials of William H. Fogas, of Mount Vernon, of M. L. Humston, of Goodland, and of J. W. Bosse, of Decatur, all in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the adoption of Schedule B of the war-revenue bill placing a tax on proprietary medicines; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Workmen's Progressive Educational and Mutual Benefit Society of Scranton, Pa., remonstrating against the issuance of bonds; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of sundry citizens of Missouri, declaring that the issuance of bonds is unnecessary and against the best and most vital interests of our country and people, declaring that Mr. Lincoln, in his first issue of greenbacks, established a rule for the ready and sure and safe relief of every financial stringency, remonstrating against the issuance of bonds, and praying for the issuance of greenbacks or full legal-tender notes in sufficient amount to meet the present exigency, and to have coined into standard silver dollars, at the ratio of 16 to 1, without unnecessary delay, all of the silver seigniorage now in the possession of the Government. The petition is numerously signed, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I also present the memorial of sundry mercantile firms of St. Louis, Mo., remonstrating against a certain provision in the pending revenue bill. It is a very short memorial, and I ask that it may be printed without the signatures and referred to the Committee on Finance, so that the committee may have before it the propositions the memorialists make.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of George B. Harper Command, No. 714, of Boonville, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the establishment of a national military park on the battlefield of Stones River, in Rutherford County, Tenn.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE presented the memorial of M. Cramer, of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the adoption of Schedule B of the war-revenue bill, placing a tax on proprietary medicines; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of 21 citizens of Fall River, Mass., holding policies in the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, remonstrating against the proposed tax on life-insurance policies; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10220) to organize a hospital corps of the Navy of the United States, to define its duties, and regulate its pay, to report it with sundry amendments and submit a report thereon. I suppose the Senator from Iowa desires to go on with the revenue bill. Otherwise I should ask the Senate to consider this bill now.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow the bill just reported to lie over, to be taken up after the revenue bill is completed.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill go upon the Calendar. I shall call it up at some time when it will not interfere with other business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the Secretary may read the amendments proposed to the bill by the committee.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs is, in line 8, after the word "officers," to insert "removable in the discretion of the Secretary." The next amendment is, on page 2, line 23, after the word "Navy," to strike out the proviso, as follows:

Provided, That the operation of the provisions of this act shall be limited to the duration of the present war with Spain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. ROACH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1698) granting a pension to Alden B. Thompson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10087) to authorize the construction of a bridge across St. Francis Lake, at or near Lake City, State of Arkansas, to report it without amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the bill (S. 4505) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Lake St. Francis, in the State of Arkansas, being Order of Business 1006 on the Calendar, be postponed indefinitely, and that the House bill just reported by me be given the place of the Senate bill on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEAR, from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 31st ultimo, relative to the appointment of a commission to settle the indebtedness of the Government growing out of the issue of bonds in aid of the construction of the Central Pacific and Western Pacific bond-aided railroads, etc., intended to be proposed to the deficiency appropriation bill, submitted a favorable report thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

STEAMSHIP CHINA.

Mr. FRYE. I report from the Committee on Commerce and ask for the present consideration of a bill.

The bill (S. 4699) to provide an American register for the steamship China was read the first time by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Present consideration is asked for the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I refused the Senator's colleague this morning in regard to a bill that he was very anxious to have considered. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow this bill to lie over. I do not want to discriminate between the two distinguished Senators from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. This ship has been chartered, and they want to sail within two or three days.

Mr. ALLISON. If I yield, I should be obliged to yield to other requests. Will it not do later in the day?

Mr. FRYE. It will do, but the War Department called my attention to it this morning. It has been there two days. It is the ship China, which carries 2,000 men.

Mr. ALLISON. I will take the chances between the two Senators from Maine and allow this bill to go through.

Mr. FRYE. It will take but a minute.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamship China, owned by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Iowa.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 4700) to receive arrearages of taxes due the District of Columbia to July 1, 1896, at 6 per cent interest per annum, in lieu of penalties and costs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 4701) granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Tilton; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EDWARD T. MATHEWS.

Mr. SEWELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Sally T. Mathews, Margaret S. Mathews, and Harriet E. Mathews, daughters of Edward T. Mathews, deceased, late clerk to the Committee on Enrolled Bills of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate per annum allowed by law to the committee clerk aforesaid; said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 1st instant approved and signed the act (S. 3088) to amend "An act to provide the times and places for holding terms of the United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892, as amended by the amendatory act approved November 3, 1893.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on this day approved and signed the bill (S. 4550) to suspend certain provisions of law relating to hospital stewards in the United States Army, and for other purposes.

COMPENSATION OF POSTMASTERS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], which comes over from yesterday. It is resolution No. 372, directing the Postmaster-General to report to the Senate the compensation of postmasters on the basis of the act of 1854, etc.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to allow the resolution to go over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the resolution will go over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4554) to authorize the establishment of post-offices at military posts or camps.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 189) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to locate a cab service, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 914) to compel street railway companies in the District of Columbia to remove abandoned tracks, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BABCOCK, Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, and Mr. RICHARDSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 148) providing for the printing of House Document No. 396, relating to the beet-sugar industry in the United States; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

WAR REVENUE BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TURLEY. I have an amendment which I wish to propose to the bill. I ask to have it follow the amendment which was adopted yesterday on the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee desire to have the amendment offered now or to have it printed?

Mr. TURLEY. I offer it now.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let us hear it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee offers an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not in order to offer an amendment at this time, but I have no objection to its being read in order that the Senate may have notice of what it is to be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Chair will direct the amendment to be printed, and it will be offered hereafter whenever the Senator from Tennessee finds an opportunity, after the committee amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. TURLEY. That is the regular order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER addressed the Senate. After having spoken five minutes, the following message was received from the House of Representatives.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed with amendments the bill (S. 4578) to remove all disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of the Constitution in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from North Carolina give way to allow the bill which has just been received from the House, proposing to remove disabilities, to be laid before the Senate?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to have the amendments of the House concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will not interrupt the regular order.

Mr. STEWART. It will not take any time.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, if it will not take any time.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate, unless objection is made, the amendments of the House to Senate bill 4578.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I supposed a communication from the House to be always in order.

Mr. HALE. Not to interrupt a Senator upon the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not without the consent of the Senator speaking.

Mr. BUTLER. I have consented, because it is a matter which it seems to me we ought to pass unanimously and at once.

Mr. HALE. I shall vote for the measure very gladly at the proper time, but I object to the proceedings being interrupted.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is it in order or not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from North Carolina yielded for that purpose, and it is in order to lay the amendments before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Let it go over for a day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

WAR REVENUE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

Mr. BUTLER resumed his speech. After having spoken for an hour and a half,

Mr. CANNON. As the Senator from North Carolina is discussing a most important feature of the bill, my judgment is there should be a quorum in attendance.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senator will not suggest the absence of a quorum. I do not want to disturb Senators who are outside.

Mr. CANNON. I would cheerfully defer to the wish of the Senator from North Carolina in most respects, but not in this. I think what he is saying is of sufficient interest to justify the attendance of Senators, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Faulkner,	McEnery,	Roach,
Allison,	Foraker,	McLaurin,	Spooner,
Bacon,	Frye,	Mallory,	Stewart,
Bate,	Gallinger,	Martin,	Sullivan,
Burrows,	Gear,	Mason,	Thurston,
Butler,	Gorman,	Mitchell,	Tillman,
Cannon,	Hanna,	Morgan,	Turley,
Carter,	Hansbrough,	Morrill,	Turpie,
Chandler,	Harris,	Murphy,	Vest,
Clark,	Heitfeld,	Nelson,	Wellington,
Clay,	Jones, Ark.	Perkins,	Wetmore,
Cockrell,	Jones, Nev.	Pettigrew,	White,
Cullom,	Kyle,	Pettus,	Wolcott,
Davis,	Lindsay,	Platt, Conn.
Fairbanks,	Lodge,	Pritchard,
	McBride,	Rawlins,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

[Mr. BUTLER resumed and concluded his speech. See Appendix.]

Mr. WHITE. On page 6080 of the RECORD this morning, the RECORD upon our desk, is the amendment to the bill which was adopted upon my motion yesterday. I have discovered clerical errors in this regard. After the words "every person" there should be inserted "firm, corporation, or company," and after the words "any person," further on in the amendment, before the word "failing," there should be inserted "or officer."

I have submitted the corrections to the Senator from Rhode Island, who was in charge of the matter at the time, and he agrees with me that the amendments ought to be made to carry out the view therein expressed. I ask unanimous consent to have the same inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "person," in the first line of the amendment, insert the words "firm, corporation, or company."

Mr. WHITE. I suggest in the same place that there should be a heading, as follows:

Excise taxes on persons, firms, companies, and corporations engaged in refining petroleum and sugar.

I suggest that simply as a heading at that place, in lieu of the former heading, which I find was stricken out. I did not know it at the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment submitted by the Senator from California will be considered as agreed to, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The second amendment submitted by the Senator from California will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert the figures "177" and the words: Excise taxes on persons, firms, companies, and corporations engaged in refining petroleum and sugar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be agreed to, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 24 of the amendment, after the word "person," insert the words "or officer."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

The Secretary will report the next amendment of the committee, which is on page 46.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yesterday I asked the consent of the Senator from Iowa to have amendment No. 66, on page 29, passed over. As far as I am concerned, I am willing that the paragraph shall now be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. ALLISON. That is right.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I would suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that there should be some modification of the language as proposed by the committee. The amendment as proposed by the committee reads, in line 24, on page 29:

And the provisions of this act shall include all medicinal articles, etc.

It was the intention of the committee in proposing the amendment to make that class of drugs taxable as proprietary medicines, and things of that sort were taxed, and I think the language used hardly accomplishes the purpose of the committee. I suggest that in lieu of that the clause be amended so as to read:

And the stamp taxes provided for in Schedule B of this act shall apply to all.

I suggest the insertion of those words before the word "medicinal," after striking out everything down to the word "medicinal" from the beginning of line 23. Instead of the words "and the provisions of this act shall include all" I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill the words "and the stamp taxes provided in Schedule B of this act shall apply to all," to come in before the word "medicinal," in the twenty-fourth line, on page 29.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas propose to strike out all from the word "physician," in line 22, down to the word "medicinal," in line 24?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes, sir. My impression is that that was done yesterday. If it was not, it should be done. That was the suggestion of the committee, and it ought to be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerks inform the Chair that it was left entirely open, and that no action was taken upon the clause.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I know it was the intention of the committee to have those words stricken out. Then, before the word "medicinal," to insert the words I propose in lieu of the words which have been heretofore suggested by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to strike out and insert offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Instead of the proposed committee amendment, before the word "medicinal," in line 22, I move to insert the words "and the stamp taxes provided for in Schedule B of this act shall apply to all."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out, beginning with the word "but," in line 22, page 29, down to and including the word "any," in line 24, as follows:

But nothing in this act shall be construed to exempt from stamp tax any.

And insert:

And the stamp taxes provided for in Schedule B of this act shall apply to all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I now suggest, in line 24, on the same page, that the words "whether simple or" should be stricken out.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 24, after the word "articles," it is proposed to strike out "whether simple or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Now I move that the word "trade-mark" be inserted after the word "patent," in line 1, on page 30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, line 1, after the word "patent," it is proposed to insert "trade-mark."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In line 2, on the same page, I move to strike out the words "have on their labels or wrappers recommendations" and that the words "are advertised on the package or otherwise" be inserted in their place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, line 2, after the word "which," it is proposed to strike out "have on their labels or wrappers recommendations" and insert "are advertised on the package or otherwise."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The word "proprietary," in line 4, on page 30, I believe, has been stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That word has been stricken out.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Now I ask the Senator from Iowa to agree to recur to page 27.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator, before he makes that suggestion, allow the clause to be read which has just been amended?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly. It should be read as it has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the clause as it has been amended.

The SECRETARY. As amended the paragraph reads:

And the stamp taxes provided for in Schedule B of this act shall apply to all medicinal articles compounded by any formula, published or unpublished, which are put up in style or manner similar to that of patent, trade-mark, or proprietary medicine in general, or which are advertised on the package or otherwise as remedies or specifics for any ailment, or as having any special claims to merit, or to any peculiar advantage in mode of preparation, quality, use, or effect, whether such claim be real or pretended.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Iowa to consent, on page 27, line 22, to strike out the words "receive from any person or."

Mr. ALLISON. I agree to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 17, on page 27, line 22, after the word "shall," it is proposed to strike out "receive from any person or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 22, on page 29, I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the word "receipt," which manifestly ought to be "recipe"—"recipe or prescription of any physician."

The Senator will undoubtedly agree to have that word changed.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, after the word "written," at the end of line 21, it is proposed to strike out "receipt" and insert "recipe."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I will ask the Senator if he has perfected that portion of the bill in reference to the taxes on proprietary articles?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That has not yet been reached.

Mr. ALLEN. I desired yesterday to submit an amendment to that portion of the bill when it was reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Nebraska that that has not yet been reached.

Mr. ALLEN. I judged from what the Senator from Arkansas had been saying and from the amendments he had been offering that we had reached it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The amendments I have offered, if the Senator will permit me, were at the bottom of page 29 and at the top of page 30, and did not relate to proprietary medicines, but simply provided that medicines put up in a similar manner shall be taxed. Schedule B, which provides for the tax on proprietary medicines, is to be found on page 53 of the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. There is a provision in regard to that on page 15.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Before we leave pages 29 and 30, if Senators are through with their amendments, there is a formal amendment that should come in, if Senators do not object to finishing that particular clause.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Nebraska was asking some questions about Schedule B.

Mr. ALLEN. I had simply observed that yesterday I found Senators introducing amendments, not committee amendments, and that they were being considered, and on inquiry I found that the committee were not through with their amendments. This morning I find the Senate in the same shape. The committee are not through, and if this is going to be a general thing I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The amendments I have offered are amendments to the committee amendments. There have been no propositions to amend the original text of the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. In that case I subside.

Mr. WOLCOTT. On line 6, page 30, the last seven words, "whether such claim be real or pretended," should go out of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so, too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 19, on line 6, page 30, after the word "effect," it is proposed to strike out "whether such claim be real or pretended."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am not sure that those words ought to go out of the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, yes; because that is a question that should not be inquired into by the law. Nobody looks to see whether these medicines cure everything or not, and nobody can prove it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I presume the section would be as strong without the words as with them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The next amendment which had been passed over was, on page 47, line 2, after the word "shall," to insert "hereafter;" at the end of the same line, after the word "lives," to strike out "(not including policies of insurance against accident only);" and in line 4, after the word "thereof," to strike out "two" and insert "ten," so as to read:

Insurance (life): Policy of insurance, or other instrument, by whatever name the same shall be called, whereby any insurance shall hereafter be made upon any life or lives, for each $100 or fractional part thereof, 10 cents on the amount insured.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, on page 47, line 7, after the words "shall be," to strike out "1 cent for each unit of 5 cents of weekly premium" and insert "6 cents for each $100 or fractional part thereof on the amount insured."

Mr. ALDRICH. In place of the amendment just read, and also in place of amendment No. 123, I offer, by direction of the committee, what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of amendments No. 121 and No. 122 it is proposed to strike out all after the words "shall be," in line 7, on page 47, down to and including the word "act," in line 12, and to insert:

Fifty per cent of the amount of the first weekly premium paid; and it shall be the duty of each person, firm, or corporation issuing such policies to make within the first fifteen days of every month a sworn statement to the collector of internal revenue in each of their respective districts of the total amount of the first weekly premiums received on such policies issued by the said person, firm, or corporation during the preceding month, and upon the total amount so received the said person, firm, or corporation shall pay the said tax of 50 per cent: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any fraternal beneficiary society or order operated on the lodge system which is organized and conducted by the members thereof for the sole benefit of its members and not for profit.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to have the section in regard to life insurance read as it has been amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. At the bottom of page 46, beginning with line 25, the clause as amended reads:

Insurance (life): Policy of insurance, or other instrument, by whatever name the same shall be called, whereby any insurance shall hereafter be made upon any life or lives, for each $100 or fractional part thereof, 10 cents on the amount insured: Provided, That on all policies, for life insurance only, issued on the industrial or weekly-payment plan of insurance, the tax shall be 50 per cent of the amount of the first weekly premium paid, and it shall be the duty of each person, firm, or corporation issuing such policies, to make within the first fifteen days of every month a sworn statement to the collector of internal revenue in each of their respective districts, of the total amount of the first weekly premiums received on such policies, issued by the said person, firm, or corporation during the preceding month, and upon the total amount so received, said person, firm, or corporation shall pay the said tax of 50 per cent: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any fraternal beneficiary society or order operated on the lodge system, which is organized and conducted by the members thereof for the sole benefit of its members and not for profit.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President—

Mr. ALDRICH. I would suggest after the word "premium," in the amendment where it reads "50 per cent of the amount of the first weekly premium paid," the word "paid" should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by striking out the word "paid" after the word "premium" where it first occurs.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. The next amendment which was passed over is on page 52.

Mr. DANIEL. The Chair did not hear me, although I addressed the Chair with respect to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will regard the amendment as not having been agreed to if the Senator desires to speak to it.

Mr. DANIEL. The amendment is not printed.

Mr. ALDRICH. It has not been printed, but it was agreed to in the committee when the Senator from Virginia was present.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand that. I was merely going to make a suggestion respecting the amendment and to make a statement which I think may possibly affect the mind of the Senate in regard to this tax of 50 per cent on the first weekly premium paid in industrial insurance companies.

These industrial insurance companies are companies of the poor people. In very many cases the premiums are paid in 5-cent weekly installments, and the average policy is not over $100. It was so stated, at least, by a company of this description in the city of Richmond, where there is a company that conducts a considerable business in this line. In their purposes they might almost be described as benevolent associations. They are associations in which the laboring classes and those of the poorer order make provision by little 5-cent weekly premiums for their burial or for some little stipend to go to their needy and dependent families.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, is he addressing himself to the matter included in lines 5, 6, and 7 on page 47?

Mr. DANIEL. I am addressing myself to the amendment proposed by the committee, which is not printed, but it comes in on page 47.

Mr. ALDRICH. In lines 7, 8, 9, and 10.

Mr. DANIEL. The amendment is in the tenth line, I think.
Mr. GALLINGER. I notice the words "on all policies, for life insurance only, issued on the industrial or weekly plan of insurance." Is that it?

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. DANIEL. That is it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not been connected with that class of associations. I belong to certain assessment orders, but I did not know there were any such companies as are referred to here, and I wanted to inquire of the committee about the matter.

Mr. DANIEL. I have very little familiarity with this class of companies myself. I have never had any personal experience or observation of them, but the information which has been given to the committee on the subject I am sure will not be contradicted, as it comes in a very reliable form.

Mr. President, it seems to me that companies of this description ought to be dealt with as leniently as possible. I do not mean to say that they should escape taxation. I have very little sympathy with any class of people who desire to escape all taxation; but certainly this is a class that deserves the utmost consideration and the greatest degree of leniency that is practicable under any equitable scheme of taxation.

There is a difficulty, which has been suggested, as to requiring half of the first premium as a tax, which arises from the practical operations of these companies, as I am informed. I am told that amongst insurance companies it is frequently the practice, if not the general rule, to give to the agent, as his compensation, the first premium. I know that is the rule in some companies, and it might disarrange their business to fasten this tax upon that premium, which is usually accorded to the agent as a part of his compensation. This is not the only tax put upon them, and it seems to me that we might well strike it out in a bill of this sort, which is not aimed to distribute taxes, but is directed against certain things which it is supposed should be peculiarly taxed.

I hope that those words as to the first weekly premium may be stricken out. I do not think that it amounts to any considerable tax, and I do not believe that the class of people to whom it is directed is a very large one, but it strikes a peculiar class of companies, it seems to me, rather heavily. So I will move to strike out the words "50 per cent of the first weekly premium paid."

Mr. ALDRICH. I confess I am somewhat surprised at the motion made by the Senator from Virginia. This matter was fully discussed in the Committee on Finance and I supposed had the unanimous approval of that committee.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator thinks I am doing anything I ought not to do—

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think so at all. I do not mean to say that.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator thinks I am doing anything I ought not to do by any honorable consideration, I will withdraw the amendment at once, for I do not wish to trench upon the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. No, I do not say that; but I did say that I thought the amendment had the unanimous approval of the committee. It was certainly discussed at great length in the committee, and I believe the amendment is an eminently proper and just one.

Mr. DANIEL. I will state that I happened to be out of the committee at the time when this matter was adopted, and I was misinformed as to its adoption at the last meeting which I attended. I have been very regular in my attendance, but I had misinformation upon the subject which misled me. I certainly would not wish to do anything to trench upon the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. Is this intended to reach purely local cooperative companies?

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. DANIEL. No; but companies of the same description everywhere. They are small industrial insurance companies which have a little 5-cent premium, and this provision takes 2½ per cent out of the first weekly premium.

Mr. ALLEN. The country is full of little local organizations among the poorer classes of people, where there is no particular capital and where assessments are made to pay the officers. They, I believe, ought not to be taxed.

Mr. ALDRICH. This provision does not apply to that class. The class to which it applies is a class of companies distinct in themselves; but the whole business is based upon the weekly payment of a premium, usually of 5 cents, for which the insured receives a policy varying in amount, depending upon his age, his health, and a variety of causes. Instead of issuing a policy of $10,000, upon which a certain premium is paid, the insured pays a certain premium, based upon a unit of 5 cents a week, and for that receives an amount of insurance depending upon his age and his physical condition.

As the bill was reported to the Senate, we placed the tax upon that class of insurance at "6 cents for each hundred dollars, or fractional part thereof, on the amount insured."

The officers of these companies came before the committee, or before certain members of the committee, and explained to them that it was impossible to levy the insurance in that way; that it would be a very inequitable manner of levying the tax, and they suggested that the plan adopted by the House of Representatives of making an assessment upon the weekly premium was the only equitable method by which this tax could be assessed, and I was satisfied they were right.

These companies are not, as the Senator from Virginia seems to indicate, small companies. The Metropolitan Insurance Company, of New York, is one of the largest companies in the United States, and the Prudential Company, of Newark, N. J., is also one of the largest companies in the United States, doing a very large amount of insurance, almost equal to that of any other company in the country. They are rich companies, they are very strong companies, and are very earnest and active competitors with the other life-insurance companies in the country. The tax which is imposed by the amendment now offered is less than half in proportion to what is assessed upon the other life-insurance companies.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will permit me, speaking of small companies, I thought I conveyed the idea—I do not know that I gave that impression—that they were companies which did insurance business for the poorer people, and they will certainly arrange for this tax to come out of those people, according to all the theories we have from the other side and according to the experiences of human nature.

I have no doubt that some of the strong and powerful companies of which the honorable Senator speaks, in Newark and elsewhere, who are engaged in a war of competition, would be very glad to crush out some of the small companies. That is the general rule of competition in trade.

The strong and powerful like to crush out the weak, so as to give themselves the field; but it seems to me the weak companies are the kind that ought to be encouraged. If you are going to make exemptions, I think these more worthy of exemption than are building and loan associations, for these are companies which provide the shrouds for the dead and the next day's meal for those who are left destitute. They come very nearly amounting to eleemosynary associations; and in a bill which has so scrupulously avoided taxing the great and powerful corporations of the country it seems to me that there could be no greater incongruity in a scheme of taxation than to bear with a heavy hand upon this class of corporations.

It seems to me if there is anything that deserves the peculiar leniency and forbearance and sympathy of the legislature it is to be found in this class of institutions. They are the corporate houses of refuge for the poor and the needy. One had almost as well put a heavy tax upon the almshouses of the country and at the same time exempt the marble and the brownstone mansions as to be cumulating taxation upon this class of corporations and yet day after day be struggling to avoid any tax upon the great and powerful.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, if I was surprised when the Senator from Virginia made his motion, I am more surprised at his argument. Now, let us look at the facts of this case. This proposed tax is practically only 2½ cents on each policy issued upon which is paid $2.60 a year on a policy of insurance amounting to from forty to one hundred dollars.

Mr. DANIEL. The average is $100.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Virginia will excuse me for a moment, the Senator says this will come out of the agents, because they are paid a certain proportion of the whole of these weekly premiums for their commissions. If it will come out of the agents, it will not be paid by the men who are insured, of course. Those insurance policies are all issued on a basis of a 5-cent payment, and they can not come out of the insured. If there is any one provision in this bill which is so carefully guarded that the tax can not be paid by the insured it is this very provision. These companies say, and say truthfully, that they or their agents will have to pay this tax. It can not be otherwise. They have got their policies and rates of insurance so adjusted that they can not change them. The payment is 5 cents each week. If it comes out of the agent, it is the agent that the Senator from Virginia is making this appeal for; and if it comes out of the companies, it is the companies he is making the appeal for.

One of these companies, the Metropolitan Insurance Company, has had sufficient funds to erect that marble palace on the corner of Twenty-third street and Fourth avenue, New York; and, as I understand, one of the finest buildings in the city of Newark was built by the Prudential Company. There are only a half dozen of these companies in the United States, and one happens to be in the State of Virginia, as I understand it.

The people who are insured can not possibly pay any part of this tax, and the insurance companies who are affected outside of the company in Virginia, so far as I know, are not complaining.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator from Rhode Island state the section he is endeavoring to amend?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is the section on page 47.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, let the amendment be stated again, please.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island has been adopted. The Senator from Virginia proposes to amend the amendment which has been adopted.

Mr. SEWELL. Let it be read.

Mr. DANIEL. If I may be permitted to make a parliamentary inquiry, I beg to suggest that the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. FAULKNER. The original amendment offered by the committee was adopted, and the amendment to which the Senator from Virginia calls the attention of the Chair was simply a verbal correction in the amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. Oh, yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey desire to have it read?

Mr. SEWELL. Yes.

The SECRETARY. Strike out amendments numbered 121 and 122, on page 47, and insert the following:

Fifty per cent of the amount of the first weekly premium. And it shall be the duty of each person, firm, or corporation issuing such policies to make within the first fifteen days of every month a sworn statement to the collector of internal revenue in each of their respective districts of the total amount of the first weekly premiums received on such policies issued by the said person, firm, or corporation during the preceding month, and upon the total amount so received the said person, firm, or corporation shall pay the said tax of 50 per cent: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any fraternal beneficiary society or order operated on the lodge system, which is organized and conducted by the members thereof for the sole benefit of its members and not for profit.

Mr. SEWELL. I think that is satisfactory. I should like to add an exemption of employees' relief associations.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think that is covered by the language used by the committee. It was intended to do so.

Mr. SEWELL. I prefer to have it distinctly stated.

Mr. ALDRICH. It should be, where they are conducted for their own benefit, not for profit.

Mr. SEWELL. It is entirely for their own benefit, not for profit.

Mr. WOLCOTT. They are within the exception.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think they are clearly included in the exemption of the committee.

Mr. SEWELL. If the committee say so, that is satisfactory.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes, sir; I think so, without any question.

Mr. SPOONER. As I understand this section, it now excludes from taxation no insurance company except when conducted upon what is known as the lodge system. Am I correct about that?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes. And I understand the lodge system to be an aggregation of employees or farmers or anybody else who carry on beneficiary insurance simply for their own benefit. That language was used in the statute heretofore, and it has been construed to apply to that class of organizations.

Mr. GALLINGER. Patrons.

Mr. ALDRICH. Patrons of Husbandry, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. SPOONER. As it came from the House, the bill contained this clause:

Provided, That cooperative life insurance assessment orders and companies, as well as all policies issued by them, shall be exempt from taxation under this act.

Mr. ALDRICH. That included too large a range of companies. It included a lot of companies doing a very large insurance business, not for their own benefit, but for profit. The committee believed that all that class of companies should pay taxes.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is aware that there are in the country a vast number of small insurance corporations or associations created by farmers or others which are not conducted for profit, which, so far as I know, are not conducted upon the lodge system, in some of which, I think in most of them, no salaries are paid. It is simply an agreement among a number of men living in the same locality to insure each other.

Mr. ALDRICH. I know the same language was used in the act of 1864, and it was construed to mean the very class of cases about which the Senator from Wisconsin is now talking. If the Senator from Wisconsin can suggest any language that would not let in almost all companies, I should be very glad to have him suggest it.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it intended by the committee to levy this tax upon any insurance which is conducted without profit?

Mr. ALDRICH. Any insurance conducted by the members of the organization themselves, or whatever they are called, to insure each other without any profit is intended to be included in the exemption. The exemption is intended to cover that class of insurance.

Mr. SPOONER. I will undertake to draw an amendment which will beyond any possible question reach that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator will not. We had several suggested to us which would let in a great mass of the insurance companies of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. I will endeavor to guard against that. I think the Senator has drawn this so as to include a great many that ought not to be taxed.

Mr. LODGE. I suppose this clause as now framed covers all mutual insurance companies. I understand that has been passed upon by the committee in the Senate, and I do not desire to delay the bill by debating it. It seems to me the tax is very high on these mutual companies. I ask leave simply to print two memoranda in regard to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The papers referred to are as follows:

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Boston, May 19, 1898.

DEAR SIR: The taxation of life-insurance companies.—It is not altogether possible to give in the narrow space of an official correspondence all the reasons that can be urged against a tax upon life-insurance companies. In times of war, when self-preservation calls aloud for utmost exertion and every resource, the temptation not to neglect institutions so profitable as life-insurance companies are commonly supposed to be, and full of available funds, is multiplied manifold. There seems in regard to insurance companies of all kinds no valid reason why every person who is in any way connected with them should not be taxed for the support of the Government according to his ability as an individual, and any tax on the company after that is, in fact, taxing him beyond his share, and if he is a policy holder, exacting a penalty on his prudence.

Life-insurance companies are built up almost entirely of contracts extending over the entire lives of policy holders, or the larger part of them, and requiring small annual payments to be accumulated at compound interest in order to pay large sums at the close of life or at a very advanced age.

These annual premiums are carefully calculated on certain assumptions as to future interest, the average vitality or chances of after life at given ages, and the probable expenses of managing the business.

In the year 1862 the subject of taxing the funds of life-insurance companies was brought before Congress, and after mature consideration by both Senate and House of Representatives was defeated. In the course of the Senate debate Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, moved to strike out of the general-tax bill all that related to life-insurance companies, because the whole capital in life insurance was taxed under other provisions of the bill—that is to say, the accumulations or capital of life-insurance companies being composed of bank, railroad, and other stocks and securities, should not pay a double tax.

Mr. Sumner favored the proposition, and spoke as follows: "The business of life insurance, as it seems to me, is peculiar. It differs from others in being not strictly, if I may say so, a money-making business. I know that persons get up insurance companies in order to advance their own interests, but the primary object of the insurance office is to protect other people, particularly the poor; it is to help the poor. I say, therefore, it is not primarily, as compared with many other businesses, a money-making business. On that account, as it seems to me, it has a title to certain consideration. Now, what is proposed? A tax on the premiums. What are the premiums? The premiums are themselves a tax. The premiums constitute the tax which the person insured pays for his insurance. This is the precise case. I state it in this way in order to reduce it, if I may say so, to its most naked form."

The question was asked by Mr. Chandler, of Michigan: "Why do you tax railroads on their gross receipts of their passenger earnings?" to which Mr. Dixon, of Connecticut, replied: "I will tell you why. The money belongs to them—it is their money. They spend a portion of it, it is true, in their incidental expenses just as the insurance companies spend a portion of their funds in transacting their business; but that money belongs to the railroad company; it is their fund. They do not hold it in trust for anybody. They hold it for themselves. The insurance company receives money in trust, a solemn and sacred trust. There can be no more sacred fund than the fund which an insurance company receives from those who take out policies in the office. They hold it for them. They are bound to pay it all out, etc." (See Congressional Debates, 1862.)

The views of these statesmen at a time when a somewhat similar condition of national affairs existed, it seems to me, are pertinent in the present condition of things. No one wishes to shirk his duty so far as contributing to the sinews of war is concerned. Everyone should do his duty, but such a tax should not be enforced as would lose sight of discrimination and cause an undue burden upon a particular business which is of itself a tax upon our citizens and in which there is no profit, for the companies are all mutual and have no source of profit as in ordinary modes of business. Whatever of savings there may be is returned to the individuals composing the company to lighten the tax laid upon them by the assessment of premiums.

In conclusion, it is not reasonable to expect that a business already a tax should be still further burdened by another and excessive tax.

In behalf of the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company, I beg that your deliberations may be attended by a just discrimination of the purposes for which the institution was created.

The proposed stamp tax, it appears to the writer, if a reasonable one, can not be objected to, but a tax upon premiums, in themselves a tax, ought not to be levied.

Yours, truly,

BENJ. F. STEVENS,
President.

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Memorandum upon the proposition to subject mutual life insurance companies to the tax proposed to be laid upon corporations.

Every mutual life insurance company ought to be exempt from taxation, because:

(a) Since it has no stock, it has no funds except those derived from the premiums paid by its members. A tax upon it can be paid only out of such funds, and is not a tax on the corporation, but a direct tax on each individual member in the proportion to his interest in the fund. (See Appendix A.)

(b) The funds are applicable only to the payment of losses and the necessary incident expenses. To tax them is to tax losses and to increase the losses by the amount of the tax. (See Appendix A.)

(c) Losses are neither a proper subject-matter for, nor a proper measure of, taxation; nor is their occurrence the proper occasion of taxation. (See Appendix A.)

(d) The bases on which mutual premiums and reserves are computed, and on which the legal standard of solvency is predicated, make no provision for taxation. A tax can be paid only out of the legal reserve, rendering the company insolvent, unless and only so long as, an experience more fortunate than the assumptions produces a surplus sufficient to meet the tax. (See Appendix A.)

(e) To take the surplus by taxation is to make the policy holder pay more for his insurance than its proper cost to the company.

(f) During the civil war, when the necessities of the Government compelled a most careful search for every proper source of revenue, the Congress fully and carefully considered the proposal to tax mutual life insurance companies, and refused to do so because the funds were not employed in business for the benefit of the members, but were contributed by them and were used only for the adjustment of losses and were therefore in themselves in the nature of a tax; so that a tax on them would be in the nature of a tax on a tax.

To summarize: A tax in any form upon a mutual insurance company is a tax on its members individually, and is paid and must be paid only by them, out of their premiums, so much reducing the surplus to be returned and so much increasing consequently the yearly cost of their policies. It is not a tax on their property, but upon their losses, and is laid upon the money which is the distributive share of each member in those losses as it passes through the hands of the company to make good the original sufferer.

Amendment to H. R. 10100: Add the following after the words "United States," at the end of line 2, page 61:

"The provisions of the section shall not apply to any insurance company or association which conducts all its business solely upon the mutual plan, and only for the benefit of its policy holders or members, and having no capital stock and no stock or shareholders, and holding all its property in trust and in reserve for its policy holders or members; nor to that part of the business of any insurance company having a capital stock and stock and share holders which is conducted on the mutual plan, separate from its stock plan of insurance, and solely for the benefit of the policy holders and members insured on said mutual plan, and holding all the property belonging to and derived from said mutual part of its business in trust and reserved for the benefit of its policy holders and members insured on said mutual plan."

APPENDIX A.

A mutual life insurance company is a collection of policy holders, assembled in corporate form, doing their own business at their own risk, in order that each one may get his individual family protection at its exact cost to the company without having to pay a profit to stockholders.

A tax on such a company is a direct tax on the members who alone compose it. The company, as a corporation, merely collects from each member his share of the tax and pays it over to the Government, for a mutual company, having no stock and no stockholders, has no funds except those derived from the premiums paid in by its members on their policies.

The premium paid in by a member or policy holder is calculated to fulfill two purposes: First, to pay the death losses of the year, and also to provide a reserve against the certain future greater losses as the membership gets older; and second, to pay running expenses. These things cover the normal cost of insurance. Whatever is left of the premium after providing these things through the year—if anything is left—is surplus, and is returned to the policy holder as an overpayment, or in ordinary, but incorrect speech, as a "dividend." Whatever is paid for taxes comes out of that surplus—if there is a surplus—and makes the return of surplus just so much less, and makes the cost of his insurance just so much more. Any tax on a life insurance company or on its premiums is a direct tax on the individual policy holder who pays the premium taxed. He does not see the tax. It is not intended that he should. It is intended that he shall suppose that it is a tax on a corporation only, and not on him. But he pays it, and no one else, and it is the Government's addition to the cost of his family's protection.

If there is no surplus, then a tax can be paid only by taking the money from the reserve which the law requires the company to hold, and which is necessary to the solvency of its policies. If its reserve be impaired, the company is so far bankrupt, and it can pay only a percentage of its claims.

The assumptions upon which a mutual life insurance company's business is based are these three: A rate of probable mortality; a rate of interest on so much of its premiums as are not needed for the lighter losses, while its members are young and are reserved for the heavy losses when they grow older; a provision for business expenses. Presumably, the death losses and expenses will use up every cent of the premiums computed on these bases, and each member's policy will cost him his full premium. No provision is made for a tax. None can be paid, unless the experience is more favorable than the assumptions, without impairing the reserve and rendering the company insolvent.

LIFE INSURANCE OUGHT NOT TO BE TAXED AT ALL.

Taxation ought to bear on the possession and use of property and not upon the loss of property or upon the means by which such losses are distributed.

The only moral and humane theory of taxation is the collection of only such moneys as are necessary for the proper and legitimate expenditures of the Government from such sources that is, from such persons owning such properties as ought to bear those expenditures and in the proportion in which they ought to bear them.

Under such a theory no one would suggest a tax upon people's losses. These could be regarded neither as the proper subject-matter of taxation nor as a humane basis of the distribution of tax burdens.

No one would suggest that because a man's house on which he has been paying taxes has been burned he should at once pay a special tax on its value which he has just lost, or that a man's family should be taxed on the money value of his life to them because he has died and they have lost that value.

Insurance is merely a method of distributing the property losses of those who have lost property among those who have not lost it. It is effected through contributions or payments called premiums.

A's house, worth $5,000, and on which he has paid taxes while it was in being, has burned. A has lost $5,000. There is no restoring it. That property and its value are gone forever, not only to A, but to the whole world. To tax A on that loss would be an unspeakable inhumanity.

But A has insured against that loss; that is, he has agreed with other house owners to share their like losses if they will assume his loss if it comes. While his house is unburnt he, by his premiums, assumes his share of the losses of those whose houses burn meantime. When his house burns they, by their premiums, take his loss on their shoulders and make it good to him. They lose it instead of A, because before that he had through his premiums been losing his share of their houses which had burnt.

Their assumption of the loss and giving A the money in place of his house has not restored the house. It has not changed the loss into gain or into an even thing. The property is gone. The loss remains. It has merely been distributed. A is made whole, but the contributors to that result have taken the loss to themselves and are just so much worse off. They have lost A's house. They have divided up the $5,000 loss among them.

To tax A additionally on the $5,000 because it was returned to him would be inhuman. It would be to make him lose something in spite of his own and others' efforts to avoid loss. It would be a loss created and inflicted by Government on the occasion of his escaping from a greater loss. It would be a fine on him for not losing.

To tax the other men who, by their premiums, have taken A's loss upon themselves and distributed it among themselves is an equal inhumanity. They have made A's loss their own to save him. To tax them on their loss is an equal outrage to taxing A upon that same loss if it had remained on him.

It is taxing a loss, and it is a fine, a punishment, upon men for so sharing each other's losses that it becomes possible for them to be borne. The group of men forming a mutual insurance company can together bear losses which would crush and destroy the individual. But it is as inhuman and tyrannous to tax the losses of the group as to tax those of the individual which he would have to bear but for the action of the group.

WHAT SUGGESTS TAXATION?

The only element in the transaction that suggests taxation of these losses, either to the individual or the group or mutual company, is the fact that it requires the use of money to adjust them, and that the money is brought into sight in the hand of the adjusting association or corporation and in easy reach of the taxgatherer, and so becomes a temptation to ignore the true nature of the fund, which is simply the collective losses of the group or company, thereby relieving the individual calamities of its members.

THE PARALLEL BETWEEN FIRE AND DEATH LOSSES.

Life insurance differs from fire insurance only in the subject-matter of the loss. Instead of a man's losing his house or other perishable property, his family loses the money value, the earning and producing capacity, of his life. His life, its money value, what it will do for them, what it will earn, is just as much property, and their property, their financial dependence, as is his house, and the loss of that life is just as much a property loss to them as that of his house is to him.

For example: If a man, aged 30, is earning $1,000 a year for his family, taking his chances of life according to the actuaries' table, and assuming money to be worth 4 per cent, the present value of his life in money to his family is $17,000. That is their actual money property in his life. That is the money they lose if he dies.

If, when he dies, the Government should openly tax that family on that loss, on that amount, the world would stand aghast. Such a government could not live, for no one could live under it.

THE ESSENCE OF LIFE INSURANCE.

Life insurance is simply the distribution of the loss of family property in the lives of husbands and fathers. The father, while he lives, by his yearly premiums, assumes his share of the loss of those families whose heads have died during the year. All the fathers who have associated themselves with him do the same thing. They, by their premiums, take each family's loss as it occurs over upon themselves and divide it among themselves. They lose the money value of the man's life instead of his family. The family is not financially crushed, for these men have taken the burden from it. They are not crushed, for they are many and have divided the burden, and the losses do not come all at once. But these men have lost the money value of that life just as truly as the family would have lost it if these men had not assumed and divided it among themselves.

To tax them as a group or company upon the loss they have thus assumed and suffered is as abhorrent to justice and humanity as it would be to leave the loss on the family and then tax the family on that loss.

The division of the tax among these men does not alter its unjust quality. It simply reduces the tax which any one man has to pay on any one loss. He does not have to pay the whole of the tax any more than he has to pay the whole of the loss. But the portion which he does pay is a tax on a loss which he has suffered by helping others to bear it, and in proportion as he has suffered it, just as much as if he had borne the whole loss and paid the whole tax on that loss.

RESERVE.

But it is urged by those unfamiliar with the detail of life insurance that the premiums do not all go at once to the payment of losses or the expense of adjusting and distributing them, but go in part to swell the assets, which, in a company with a large amount at risk, grow to a great sum, invested and earning interest for the members from whose premiums the assets have been accumulated, and which, therefore, it is alleged should be taxed.

The answer is that these assets are all held in reserve for and are to go to pay future losses. Both the additions from premiums to these assets and the interest earned on them, except the interest over 4 per cent, are to go to pay losses.

The necessity for and precise use of this reserve of assets from premiums and interest is as follows:

If men died no faster at one age than at another, the losses at each age and the cost of carrying the risk would be the same each year, and the premium for every man would be the same each year and no matter what his age; each year's losses and expenses would nearly or quite use up each year's premiums, and there would be little accumulation, comparatively. But, while out of 1,000 men aged 20 only about 8 will die in a year, out of 1,000 aged 60 26 will die. That is, the risk increases with age, and the yearly cost increases with the risk. For example, if 10,000 persons aged 20 insured for $10,000, and each paid just the increasing mortality cost each year (assuming there were no expenses), they would pay in each year of their age the following increasing premiums:

Mortality per cent. Actuaries' table. Annual term rate for $10,000. No interest assumed; and no expenses.

Age.	Rate.	Age.	Rate.	Age.	Rate.	Age.	Rate.

Experience proves that men dislike these increasing premiums, especially after they get to middle age, when the increase becomes very rapid. And in order to give a sufficient stability to a company by enabling men to pay uniform premiums in spite of the increasing cost, and avoid the risk that it may be left with a few members and not enough to pay its losses on them, it is necessary to have a premium which does not increase as the cost increases, but remains the same every year—what is called a "level premium."

It must, of course, be more than the mortality cost in the early years of the contract and less than that cost in the later years, and the excess of level premium over mortality cost in the early years, with the interest earned on it, must be reserved to meet the excess of mortality cost over level premium in the later years; that is, the "reserve" or "reserve fund" or "re-insurance fund" of a life-insurance company, accumulated while the business is young and the losses are small, to be paid out as the business grows old and the losses become heavy. But it all goes to pay losses.

For example: Suppose 10,000 men, all aged 30, form a mutual company to insure each others' families $10,000. If they paid in just the mortality cost year by year, then the first year each man would pay $84.28; the tenth year each would pay $97.94; in the twentieth year the cost would have run up to $137.81 each; in the thirtieth year it would be up to $206.93; in the fortieth year it would be $319.98; those who lived to 75 would pay $643.71 each. Men will not do this. So these men will take the "level premium" of $109.72 (assuming no expenses), and the progress of payments of premium and of death losses of earlier accumulation and later diminution and final extinction of the reserves will go on as follows:

Year.	Age.	Living.	Dy- ing.	Pre- miums.	Losses.	Pre- miums over losses.	Losses over pre- miums.	Reserve.

It is assumed in this illustration that no new business is taken in, but the original 10,000 men and their survivors each year carry on until all are gone.

In fact, the business lost by death and lapse is usually replaced by new business, so that the reserves on the successive new yearly groups of men take the place of the reserves used up in payments of losses on the old groups; but in a company of any considerable age the operations shown in the table are going forward in each group of men taken in each successive year of business. Our published returns and statements show simply the aggregates of all the changing yearly groups of reserves.

A portion of each year's premium goes to pay the losses of that year; the remainder of it, increased by interest earned, goes into the reserve for future losses until the losses overtake the premium, and then all the premiums and a part of the reserves go to the yearly losses. To tax the premiums or the reserves derived from them is to tax the losses which it is their sole function to pay. That is inhumanity.

To tax any savings that can be effected on these premiums or reserves is to increase the cost of the protection; that is, it increases the loss itself. What is not lost by death is lost to Government. Whichever way, it is pure loss. That is taxed and made to yield revenue to the Government.

Mr. ALLEN. What disposition was made of the amendment which was under consideration?

Mr. ALDRICH. It was adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was agreed to, and the Senator from Virginia is proposing to amend it.

Mr. ALLEN. There is a certain class of insurance companies in my State, and no doubt in other States, upon which the tax would operate harshly. For instance, in the State of Nebraska we have a law that not exceeding 200 farmers may form a cooperative insurance company for strictly farm purposes. It is on the assessment order. There are no salaries and no fees attached. The organization is simply for mutual protection. Would the amendment as now proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island subject those corporations or organizations to the tax?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think not, as I have already explained to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. ALLEN. They are not corporations; they are not incorporated. They are simply voluntary associations.

Mr. ALDRICH. Societies or orders.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. The language of the amendment of the committee is "societies or orders."

Mr. ALLEN. These are called farmers' mutual insurance companies. They are authorized by statute to organize, not exceeding, I think, 200 members, and issue policies and require payment monthly or yearly, as the case may be. They pay no salaries and have no agents except the secretary, and are designed simply to protect the property and rights of each other. They are not institutions for pecuniary profit, but simply institutions for pecuniary protection and mutual cooperation. I should like to have the amendment made distinct and broad enough to exclude that class of organizations.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I have already stated, the committee believe that it is broad enough to do that. If the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from Wisconsin will submit or suggest to the committee any other language which will cover those cases and not a large class of others, we shall be glad to have them do so.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator thinks this amendment exempts them, I do not want to detain the Senate by offering an amendment. I would rather go before the conference committee and make the proper representation.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator, when he comes to see in print the amendment proposed by the committee, will be satisfied that it does cover that class of cases.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope it may.

Mr. DANIEL. If my honorable friend will allow me just a moment, if acceptable, I withdraw my amendment and move to insert "25" instead of 50 per cent; so as to reduce the tax and still leave quite a reasonable tax.

Mr. ALDRICH. The whole tax is only two and a half cents.

Mr. DANIEL. The premium is only 5.

Mr. ALDRICH. We tax every check above $5 2 cents. The Senator from Virginia suggests to make this 1½ cents a year on each policy.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to put into the RECORD—I will not take the time of the Senate to read it—a letter which I send to the desk, written by the Hon. Charles E. Dyer, of Wisconsin, who was for many years one of the most accomplished Federal judges in the United States, a very able, fair, and patriotic man, which contains information upon the general subject of life-insurance taxation entitled to the gravest consideration.

The letter referred to is as follows:

NORTHWESTERN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY,
Milwaukee, May 16, 1898.

MY DEAR SIR: The bill to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, which has passed the House of Representatives and is now pending in the Senate, presents to mutual life-insurance companies a subject of not a little interest, particularly in view of certain amendments to the bill which have been proposed in the Senate. On examination of the bill as it came from the House, I observe that it provided for a stamp tax on all policies of life insurance for each $100 or fractional part thereof, 2 cents on the amount insured. This would amount to 20 cents on every thousand dollars of insurance. One of the Senate amendments proposes, we understand, to increase the rate from 2 cents on the $100 to 10 cents, which would amount to $1 for every thousand dollars of insurance.

We are very strongly impressed with the view that such a rate of taxation is grossly excessive. In contrast to it, I take the liberty to call your attention to the stamp tax imposed on life-insurance policies by the act of 1862. The amounts required by that act were 25 cents when the amount insured did not exceed $1,000; 50 cents where it exceeded $1,000 and did not exceed $5,000, and $1 where it exceeded $5,000. In other words, a policy for any amount above $5,000 paid a stamp tax of $1. Certainly the Government was in greater need of money for war expenditures during the civil war than it is for such expenditures in the present war, and yet, under the law of 1862, a stamp tax of $1 was deemed adequate on any life policy exceeding in amount $5,000; whereas, in the proposed amendment to the pending bill, a stamp tax is contemplated, as I may state for illustration, of $5 on a $5,000 policy, of $10 on a $10,000 policy, and so on in the same ratio.

Moreover, in addition to this stamp tax, it is proposed by another Senate amendment to impose upon mutual companies a special annual excise tax, which shall be the equivalent of one-fourth of 1 per cent of the whole amount of the gross receipts of such company derived from its business for the year.

No tax on income was imposed by the act of 1862. In fact, in that year, when the war of the rebellion was in progress and the country was pouring out its money and sacrificing its lives without limit for the preservation of the Union, and when the revenue bill then pending was under discussion in the Senate, Senators, irrespective of party, objected to any provision imposing a tax upon mutual life-insurance companies other than the stamp tax before referred to, and my recollection is that a provision for taxing income or assets was stricken from the bill. Such men as Senators Sumner, Sherman, and Dixon united in objection to such a tax, and one Senator stated in debate that when a man paid a life-insurance premium, he thereby imposed a tax upon himself for the protection of his family, and that, if the Government imposed a tax upon that premium, it would be simply placing a tax upon this self-imposed tax.

To illustrate the extent of such an enormous tax as is proposed by the present Senate amendments upon the Northwestern, I call your attention to the fact that the total income of the Northwestern for the year 1897 was a little over $20,000,000. Suppose the income for the year beginning June 1, 1898, to be an equal amount with that of 1897. The tax on that sum at one-fourth of 1 per cent for one year would be $50,000. In this connection I call your attention to the further fact that in 1897 the company issued policies amounting to between fifty-seven and fifty-eight million dollars. Suppose, in round numbers, the company should issue new policies in the year beginning June 1, 1898, amounting to $60,000,000.

The stamp tax on those policies, at the rate of 10 cents on every $100, would amount to $60,000; so that the tax thus imposed by the Federal Government on this company for the year would be $110,000. I submit that this would be an enormous tax and one not justified by the emergencies of the present situation. Let me say, further, that the taxes, license fees, and other charges of a miscellaneous character paid by the company in 1897 in the various States in which it transacts business amounted to about $270,000. They certainly will not be less and are likely to be considerably more than that amount in 1898, so that if the Senate amendments should be adopted, the grand aggregate which this company would be obliged to pay, say for the year commencing June 1, 1898, in the form of taxes, Federal and State, will amount to at least $880,000.

To further illustrate the effect upon life-insurance companies of such taxation as is proposed by the bill pending in Congress, if it shall be amended in the Senate as suggested, it is not out of place to refer to the fact that, according to statistics just published, the business of 1897 of New York life-insurance companies would require the payment of $824,000 as a tax on policies and $998,000 as a tax on premium income, making a grand total in New York alone of $1,822,000 per annum; that, too, derived from life-insurance companies alone.

Such a tax on some forms of policies, at some ages, would consume an entire year's loading, by which term I mean, of course, the amount which is made part of the premiums for the purpose of covering the expense of the business. I am informed that the taxes, license fees, and other charges imposed on the same companies throughout the various States where they do business, as actually paid in 1897 (excluding real-estate taxes), were $1,123,000. When these facts are understood and the extent of the burden is fully comprehended, it would seem that there should be entire concurrence in the view that the proposed legislation by Congress, if the Senate amendments shall be adopted, will bear with undue severity upon life insurance companies and that a more conservative basis will, on reflection, commend itself to the minds of Senators and Congressmen.

It is to be borne in mind that a mutual life-insurance company belongs to its members, and stands on altogether a different footing from that of a stock corporation. Under the revenue law as it shall be finally adopted every citizen who may be a policy holder in the company will be obliged, as an individual, to pay the tax, whether it be in the form of stamp tax or otherwise imposed by the law. Then the company, as a corporate organization, must also pay such stamp duties as apply to its general business transactions. For example, every draft it draws, every check it issues, every contract, conveyance, or lease it makes, every telegraphic dispatch it sends, is chargeable with a stamp tax imposed by law; and then, to superadd to the taxes thus imposed on the individual members of the corporation, and the corporation itself, as an organization representing its members, such a tax on policies and on income as the Senate amendments contemplate, it must be admitted, I think, is imposing burdens not demanded or justified by existing conditions.

Considering the question from the standpoint of present actual necessities and of justice, I beg to suggest that an adequate tax in the form of stamp duties on policies is that prescribed in the bill as it passed the House, namely, for each $100 or fractional part thereof, 2 cents on the amount insured, or in place of that such a tax as was imposed by the act of 1862, namely, 25 cents when the amount insured does not exceed $1,000, 50 cents when such amount exceeds $1,000 and does not exceed $5,000, and $1 when the amount of the insurance exceeds $5,000; and that certainly the tax upon gross incomes of one-fourth of 1 per cent per annum should be eliminated altogether.

Recognizing the fact that all should share in financial burdens cast upon the people in time of war, I trust that you may see your way clear to advocate and support a milder course of action, so far as life-insurance companies are involved, than is proposed by the Senate amendments, and one in line with the suggestions I have ventured to make.

As I have pointed out, life insurance is already under a very heavy burden of taxation. The companies are generally acting with marked generosity in their treatment of policy holders who have entered and may enter upon active military service. Though not benevolent institutions, life-insurance companies are, in the highest degree, beneficent. In a multitude of instances they stand as protectors of the State against the necessities of public charity. It certainly seems impolitic and unwise for the Government to lay burdens not absolutely necessary upon institutions which induce economy and a saving of the people's earnings.

Great Britain, as you are undoubtedly aware, has never taxed life insurance, except by a small stamp duty on the policy, and so liberal are the laws of that country on the subject that they provide that, whatever a man's income may be, if he will place one-sixth of it in life insurance, that sixth shall be wholly exempt from every form of taxation. This is a marked recognition of the fact that life-insurance companies are the best allies of the State to save its treasury from the claims of the needy.

These observations are not intended as argument against any taxation of life insurance companies, especially in time of war. But it must be recognized as the duty of the legislator to abstain from taxing such institutions beyond the limit of clear necessity, and careful reflection would seem to lead to the conclusion that the provision in the bill under consideration as it passed the House was ample, and, indeed, that there is nothing in present exigencies which requires Congress to go beyond the rate and limit of taxation which was adopted in 1862, when the very existence of the Government was involved, and was then found to be adequate.

Very respectfully,

Hon. JOHN C. SPOONER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

CHAS. E. DYER.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the difference between this tax and the corporation tax proposed and voted down with respect to this bill as applied to the particular company which is located in Virginia is several thousand dollars. When the tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent on corporations was proposed, it was asserted that it would be ruinous to some and that it was not a fair tax. That tax on the gross receipts of this company, as I am informed by the paper which I hold in my hand, would be about $3,000, whereas this tax will be $5,466.88, and will amount, as I am informed, to about eight-tenths of 1 per cent. Now, if one-quarter of 1 per cent was onerous, three-quarters is three times as onerous.

The Senator from Rhode Island says that the logic of my contention is for the benefit of the agent. No one knows better than does the Senator from Rhode Island or myself either that however you may levy taxes they will fall measurably at least and at last upon the masses of the people; and it is not for the agent, not for the company, but for social benefit that we think the tax, which at last must come out of the poor struggling laboring population who are merely trying to keep up the decencies of life and preserve their decency in death, should be as little as is compatible with the interests of the whole public.

I do not think, sir, that it comes with good grace to fight day after day against a small tax on stronger and wealthier corporations and then to accumulate it upon these corporations which might almost be classed as eleemosynary associations. Even in this amendment there have been exempted from all tax fraternal beneficiary societies, orders, or associations operated on the lodge system. Now, somebody, in the conduct of any business, must get some profit. You can not get men even to take charge of eleemosynary institutions, or to be superintendents of almshouses, or to go into the business of caring for others, without paying them salaries. Some profit must exist somewhere for somebody or there will be no business. But in the objects of these associations, in the sentiment that sustains them, and in the work which they accomplish, apart from the few salaries they may pay to the necessary officers, they are as much eleemosynary or beneficial as those which have been totally exempted. It seems to me that at the least this tax should be reduced to 25 per cent on the first premium.

Mr. ALDRICH. The radical difference in effect between the quarter per cent on the gross earnings suggested by the Senator from Virginia and this tax of 2½ cents on a policy is that one is an annual tax and the other is a tax on the policy, whether it be one year or ten years or forty years. Two and a half cents is all that is to be paid upon the policy forever, no matter how long it may last, and the tax of one-quarter of 1 per cent was an annual tax upon the same company.

Mr. DANIEL. It amounts, as long as it lasts, to more than three-quarters of 1 per cent.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not three-quarters of 1 per cent upon the gross earnings of the company.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes; on the gross earnings of this company.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. It may amount to three-quarters of 1 per cent upon the premiums received in one year. It could not amount to three-quarters of 1 per cent on the gross earnings of the company.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out "fifty," before the words "per centum," in the amendment, and insert "twenty-five."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLEN. I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After the word "order" it is proposed to insert the words "or farmers' purely local cooperative company or association," and after the word "lodge," in the same line of the amendment, insert "or local cooperative plan."

Mr. ALDRICH. I am afraid that "local cooperative plan" would include a lot of companies that ought not to be included. It seems to me that the last part of the provision in the amendment, "conducted by members thereof for their benefit," will exclude them.

Mr. ALLEN. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the companies I refer to do not have any lodges. The laws of Nebraska authorize not to exceed 300 farmers to get together and organize a mutual fire-insurance company.

Mr. ALDRICH. Fire insurance?

Mr. ALLEN. Fire insurance.

Mr. ALDRICH. That would not be covered by this. This does not apply to fire insurance.

Mr. ALLEN. Also life insurance, embracing the whole field of insurance. They do not have any lodges. They are not like the Knights of Honor or the Modern Woodmen, or organizations of that kind, which have lodges, but they have an annual meeting, a board of directors, a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer, and annually they have a meeting to adjust their business, and the secretary ex officio is the soliciting agent of the company, with no salary attached. It is purely a cooperative plan.

I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island in all frankness that it is a back fire on the exactions of Eastern insurance companies. It is to protect our people or to authorize them to protect themselves against extortion at the hands of the old-line companies. Under those circumstances I think these organizations ought to be free from taxation. They fall clearly within the category of agricultural associations or organizations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ALDRICH. Rather than take up the time of the Senate, I will submit to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, and if it seems to be wrong we will try to remedy it in conference.

Mr. ALLEN. If in conference anything happens I should like to be warned of the fact, to be present to care for it.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to offer an amendment, if any amendments are accepted, to exclude employees' relief associations, purely beneficial in their nature.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska the words "or employees' relief associations."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Not having these amendments before us, it is very difficult to know to what extent they go. I should like to inquire of the committee whether there is any provision in the bill which exempts purely mutual companies? I mean companies which have no stock.

Mr. ALDRICH. No.

Mr. BACON. There is not, as I understand from the response of the Senator from Rhode Island. Therefore I desire to offer an amendment to that effect. I would be glad if Senators, whether they recognize the propriety of the amendment or not, would indicate the point where it should most properly come in, if it should be adopted. I desire to offer an amendment exempting policies of insurance which are in companies purely mutual, having no stock.

Mr. ALDRICH. Like the Mutual Life of New York?

Mr. BACON. The Mutual Life of New York has stock.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. BACON. I thought it had $100,000 of stock.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; none whatever.

Mr. BURROWS. They are fairly well off.

Mr. BACON. I am not familiar with that particular company, but I know, for instance, in my State we have a fire company which is purely a mutual company, and there is no stock.

Mr. ALDRICH. This does not apply to fire companies.

Mr. ALLISON. It applies to life companies.

Mr. BURROWS. Life-insurance companies.

Mr. ALDRICH. This section does not apply to fire-insurance companies.

Mr. BACON. The paragraph I had before me says: "Insurance (marine, inland, and fire)."

Mr. ALDRICH. That is another section, adopted several days ago.

Mr. BACON. Which is the section? On page 47?

Mr. ALDRICH. The provision we are considering is on page 47, at the top of the page.

The SECRETARY. Amendments 118, 119, 120, and 121, inclusive.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And 122.

The SECRETARY. And 122.

Mr. BACON. I withdraw the amendment for the present, desiring to offer it to the paragraph relating to fire-insurance companies, which will not include the New York Mutual Company.

Mr. ALDRICH. At the bottom of page 53 the committee offer an amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, line 23, after the word "receipts," insert the words "exceeding $5 in amount."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 53 I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 53, line 13, amendment 143, it is proposed to insert before the word "proprietary," the word "medicinal;" in line 17, after the word "waters," to insert "except natural spring waters;" and in line 18, after the word "all," insert the word "medicinal."

Mr. BACON. It is impossible to know the situation exactly from the fact that these amendments are not before us. I understand the amendment now before the Senate to be that which exempts natural spring waters.

Mr. ALLISON. It is.

Mr. BACON. Natural spring waters or natural mineral waters? Does it include mineral waters?

Mr. ALLISON. If they are from a spring.

Mr. BACON. I suppose so, unless there is some other phraseology in the bill relative to that.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BACON. I simply desire to say that if there is anything in this country upon which there is an immense profit and for which there is an immense sale it is natural mineral waters. Of course, so far as natural spring waters other than mineral are concerned, I would not be in favor of taxing them, but take Saratoga Springs, the waters of which have an immense sale all over this country. Why they should be exempt I do not know. Why should Apollinaris be exempt? They are the waters which are consumed by people a little above the ordinary class and in very large amount consumed by people who can afford to pay the tax.

Mr. ALLISON. We have a tariff on Apollinaris water.

Mr. BACON. You also have a tariff on beer.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I would ask the Senator from Georgia whether if mineral waters, natural spring waters, are taxed at all it would not have to be, as they are issues of the land, a direct tax under the income-tax decision of the United States Supreme Court? They are personal property, the outcome of the land, and therefore not taxable under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the income-tax case.

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt an argument could be suggested, that would bring this particular product within that class, equally as good as some which seemed to be influential with the court. That is as far as my personal judgment goes.

Aside from that, I really think, when we are proposing to impose taxes, as we are doing, that this particular class of products ought not to be exempted. I have not the figures before me, but we all know that so far as mineral waters are concerned they are very largely consumed and that there must necessarily be an immense profit for those who own the springs, and if you are going to tax everything that is found in a drug store, every box of pills, every little vial of medicine, it does seem to me that these particular articles ought to be included among those which shall bear the burden. As the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] has suggested that the paying of these taxes contributes to the patriotic emotions of the public, I think those emotions ought to be encouraged among the class of people who drink these high-priced waters as well as among the class of people who do not have money enough to buy them.

Mr. GRAY. I understand that there is an exception proposed by the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. It is proposed by the committee in line 17, after "waters."

Mr. GRAY. What is the language of the exemption?

The SECRETARY. After the word "waters," in line 17, page 53, insert the words "except natural spring waters."

Mr. GRAY. I suppose that includes what are called popularly mineral waters. I hope that the amendment just read will be adopted. I am very sure that the Senator from Georgia is mistaken when he says we can rely upon the well-worn, threadbare argument against the adoption of the amendment about articles used by the rich and not by the poor. I am very sure from my own observation—I may say from my own experience—that poor people use largely these waters. They are exceedingly salutary and are much sought after and are very much preferred to the medicinal compounds that come through physicians' prescriptions. They are more and more sought for and more and more used as time goes on. That people make money out of them is no reason why the masses of the people should be deprived of the greatest possible freedom of use, so far as legal restriction is concerned. I trust that the amendment may be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment before the Senate is, in line 13, to insert "medicinal;" so as to read "medicinal proprietary articles."

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Delaware speaks of the well-worn argument of the difference between the articles sold to the rich and the articles sold to the poor. The only argument I make is that there should be equality among them, and if that is well worn and threadbare I hope it may continue to be so. I am not asking that one shall be exempted in favor of the other. I am simply saying that, whereas we are imposing these taxes upon articles which are not expensive, we ought at the same time to impose them upon articles which are expensive, in order that there may be equality between them.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator please tell us what the expense is in bottling them?

Mr. BACON. There is not any particular expense in bottling them, but those who buy them find that they are very expensive.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why not let those who buy them or those who bottle them pay this tax?

Mr. BACON. I am in favor of their doing so.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know, and I do not see why there should be any exception.

Mr. BACON. I do not see why there should be any. I am in favor of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the first amendment proposed by the committee, to insert the word "medicinal?" The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to. The next amendment is, after the word "waters," in line 17, to insert the words "except natural spring waters." Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BACON. No, Mr. President; we object to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let us have a vote on the question.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let us have a vote.

Mr. BACON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLEN. Let the question be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "waters," in line 17, page 53, insert the words "except natural spring waters."

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I should like to be heard a few moments on this question. In the case of tobacco we have especially exempted tobacco sold by the producer thereof. There is nothing clearer in argument, in my humble opinion, than that you can not tax either tobacco or mineral waters when sold by the producer thereof, he being the proprietor or tenant of the land. It is upon that ground that the income-tax decision of the Supreme Court was rendered. I have here the opinion of Chief Justice Fuller rendered in the income-tax case. In the first hearing of the income-tax case (in Pollock vs. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, 157 United States) it was held that a tax upon rents or income derived from real estate was a direct tax on the real estate, the Chief Justice stating the ground for this decision, the language of Justice Paterson in the Hylton Case (3 Dallas), that "land independently of its produce is of no value." On the rehearing of this case (159 U. S. Reports, 637), the Chief Justice said:

Whatever the speculative views of political economists or revenue reformers may be, can it be properly held that the Constitution, taken in its plain and obvious sense, and with regard to the circumstances attending the formation of the Government, authorizes a general unapportioned tax on the products of the farm, although imposed merely because of ownership, and with no possible means of escape from payment, as belonging to a totally different class from that which includes the property from whence the income proceeds?

Then, answering his own query, the Chief Justice says:

There can be but one answer, unless the constitutional restriction is to be treated as utterly illusory and futile and the object of its framers defeated.

We find it impossible to hold that a fundamental requisition, deemed so important as to be enforced by two provisions, one affirmative and one negative, can be refined away by forced distinctions between that which gives value to property and the property itself.

The product of the mine or the spring is in just the same category as the product of the farm. A valuable mineral spring upon land otherwise worthless is a part of the land and gives value to the land.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. DANIEL. In one minute. Natural spring waters flowing from the land can not be taxed by the Federal Government except by a direct tax apportioned amongst the States, unless the legislative body is going to ignore the income-tax decision.

It is plain that the natural mineral waters are not manufactured products. They have no element of the manufacture of waters in which the tax might be levied upon the manufacturer. If sold by the proprietor of the land they carry no element of the conduct of a business of buying and selling merchandise which may be taxed as a business. Beyond this, which should be conclusive of the matter, let me say, I do not think that natural mineral waters should be taxed at all, even if constitutionally liable in this way. They come from the pharmacopoeia of nature. They go to the "healing of the nations." They should not be taxed, for it is a tax upon the sick, the weak, the old, the infirm, the needy.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire to reply to the argument. When the Senator propounded the question to me before, I thought he was merely jesting; I thought he meant it rather as a criticism upon the income-tax decision, and I replied somewhat in the same vein. I see now that the Senator is in earnest. I think, however, that the answer to the argument made by the learned Senator is that this is not a tax upon the water, but upon the sale of it, and it is so expressed in the bill. Therefore the constitutional objection does not apply.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will allow me, in the case of tobacco we have provided that there shall be no tax on the sale by the producer thereof, and you would have to discriminate in this case by exempting all the sales of mineral waters by the proprietor or tenant of the land, in which case you would have one class of mineral waters upon the market sold by other parties whose business might be taxed as merchants and another class sold by producers who could not be taxed as owners or tenants of the land; and that you can not tax mineral waters at all, or the sale of them at all, by producers any more than you can tax the land, or the sale of land, except by a direct tax, is evident to my mind, if the income-tax decision is to be followed in this bill.

Mr. BACON. The question as to what has been the provision with reference to tobacco does not seem to be controlling as to what should be done here. This is distinctly a case where the tax is proposed to be laid upon the sale of waters; not upon the possession of the waters, but upon the sale. Therefore it seems to me to be exclusively a question of policy. Is it proper that these mineral waters, which are sold at such large profit, should bear their burden at this time, when we seek to place it upon everything? I am of the opinion that they should be included, and therefore I object to the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] are not to be lightly treated, in my judgment. If the old rule be true that the owner of the reversionary interest in real estate owns all above and all below the estates and all the incidents, then it is true that he owns the springs that flow from his land and that they are an inseparable incident of the land. The position of the Senator from Virginia finds a strong analogy in that class of decisions which hold that a trespass upon real estate, a removal of ice from a running stream, affords an action to the occupant of the land if it interferes with his occupancy or to the reversioner if it interferes with or injures the reversionary interest.

The decisions in this country and the English decisions are numerous and in accord. If I trespass upon the real estate of my neighbor and remove ice that has congealed in a running stream on his premises, I am liable in an action of trespass upon the real estate, and he may recover damages.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays are demanded on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator from Nebraska has given in his adhesion to the doctrine of the income-tax cases, I shall not insist on the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not given in my adhesion to the doctrine of the income-tax cases. The Senator from Georgia seems to be willing to lay down and accept the inevitable from the Supreme Court, whether it is right or wrong. I am not so inclined. If I could have my voice effectual here, I would make the Supreme Court decide the question once more, and once more I would bring them to the bar of public opinion and let them be criticised.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the amendment?

Mr. BACON. Yes; we object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 53, line 18, after the word "all" insert the word "medicinal;" so as to read:

And all medicinal preparations or compositions whatsoever.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the amendment? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

The Secretary next read amendments numbered 144, 145, 146, and 147, which were in line 21, after the word "formula," to insert a comma; in line 22, before the word "secret," to strike out the words "or occult;" in the same line, after the word "secret," to insert a comma, and in the same line, after the word "or" to insert the word "occult;" so as to read:

And all medicinal preparations or compositions whatsoever, made and sold, or removed for sale, by any person or persons whatever, wherein the person making or preparing the same has or claims to have any private formula, secret, or occult art for the making or preparing the same, or has or claims to have any exclusive right or title to the making or preparing the same.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 1, after the word "patent," to insert "or trade-mark;" so as to read:

Or which are prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed for sale under any letters patent or trade-mark, or which, if prepared by any formula, published or unpublished, are held out or recommended to the public by the makers, vendors, or proprietors thereof as proprietary medicines.

Mr. LODGE. Before that amendment is finally disposed of, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if, in his opinion, as now framed it excludes articles like tea and coffee put up in packages?

Mr. ALLISON. It does.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask if it does not exclude all food products?

Mr. ALLISON. It does.

The amendment was agreed to.

Or proprietary articles or medicinal preparations, or as remedies or specifics for any disease, diseases, or affection whatever affecting the human or animal body, as follows:

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think it was the intention to put that word before the word "proprietary."

Mr. ALLISON. In line 4, after the word "or."

The SECRETARY. Before the word "proprietary" insert the word "medicinal."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read amendment No. 149, which was, on page 54, after line 6, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Amendment No. 150—

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. One hundred and fifty is no amendment at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a mistake, I presume.

Mr. ALLISON. It is an error.

The next amendment, No. 151, was, on page 54, line 11, after the word "shall," to insert "exceed the retail price or value of 5 cents and shall;" so as to read:

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if I correctly understood that after these amendments are acted upon it will be competent for any individual Senator to offer amendment to these sections. I understood that statement to be made.

Mr. ALLISON. That is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. At this point, without objecting to the adoption of the proposed amendment which has just been read, under the understanding which seems to be agreed to on all sides, I will simply give notice that at the proper time I propose to offer an amendment reducing the rates in Schedule B one-half, making them one-half what the committee have recommended they shall be. I shall not offer the amendment now, but I shall do so at the proper time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendments were, on page 56, line 4, before the word "such," to insert "Where;" in line 5, after the word "contents," to insert "shall exceed the retail price or value of 10 cents and;" in line 6, after the word "exceed," to strike out the word "at;" and in line 7, being amendment No. 165, after the word "value," to strike out the words "the sum;" so as to read:

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of 10 cents and shall not exceed the retail price or value of 25 cents, 1 cent.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask if amendment No. 143, on page 53, has been agreed to?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to. The words "proprietary articles" were stricken out and the word "medicinal" inserted.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to have the first line of amendment 143 read, so that I may know exactly whether I have it right.

The SECRETARY. As amended the clause reads:

Medicinal proprietary articles and preparations: For and upon every packet, box, bottle, pot, or phial, etc.

Mr. CULLOM. The word "medicines" was stricken out?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was stricken out.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe there is no amendment now intervening between this point and page 76.

Mr. FAULKNER. An amendment was passed over at my request the other day.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, yes.

The SECRETARY. Amendment 175—

Mr. ALLEN. We stopped at amendment No. 165. What has become of amendments 166 to 174, inclusive?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. They were agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. All those have been agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They were not agreed to to-day, but they have been agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Those amendments have been heretofore agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. And amendment 175?

Mr. FAULKNER. No; that has not been agreed to. It was passed over at my request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Amendment 175 is pending.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge as to amendment 142, in the form it has been adopted, in reference to the question whether the receipts there spoken of are to cover deposits in banks, building associations, and savings societies. I ask whether that has been agreed to?

Mr. ALLISON. Where they are put upon a book, they are not included. They are specially exempted, and it is so understood.

Mr. FAULKNER. If amendment 175 is now before the Senate, I desire to offer an amendment to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read amendment No. 175.

The SECRETARY. On page 53, amendment 175, insert the following:

That all articles and preparations provided for in this schedule which are in the hands of manufacturers or of wholesale or retail dealers on the 1st day of June, 1898, shall be subject to the payment of the stamp taxes herein provided for, but it shall be deemed a compliance with this act as to such articles on hand in the hands of wholesale or retail dealers as aforesaid who are not manufacturers to affix the proper adhesive tax stamp at the time the packet, box, bottle, pot, or phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, is sold at retail.

Mr. FAULKNER. In line 2, after the word "manufacturers," I move to strike out "or of wholesale or retail dealers;" and commencing on line 5, after the word "provided for," to strike out all down to and including line 10.

Mr. CULLOM. How will that leave it?

Mr. FAULKNER. It would then read:

That all articles and preparations provided for in this schedule which are in the hands of manufacturers on the 1st day of June, 1898, shall be subject to the payment of the stamp taxes herein provided for.

The object and the purpose of the amendment is to exclude taxation by the stamp tax upon articles in the hands of wholesalers and retailers. In other words, those men have become owners of the property, and it would be, in fact, in violation, as I understand it, of the decision of the court and of the Constitution to impose upon them a tax as they would sell each one of the articles then as their property. They have purchased the articles at a given price. The manufacturer of the articles, it is true, make a very large profit on them, but the retail and wholesale sellers make a very small profit. There are included in this class not less than 500,000 retail sellers of medicines, drugs, preparations, etc., and, I suppose, about 50,000 wholesale sellers.

It would be the greatest injustice to impose this tax upon the wholesale seller. He buys these articles in large boxes, and he would have to open the box and stamp each one of the articles and rebox them for the purpose of sale. A great injustice would be imposed upon them; and yet they are articles that have almost a fixed and determined price, and it would be impossible for either the wholesaler or retailer to increase the price. Therefore, almost the entire burden of the law would fall upon those who have bought these articles in the usual course of trade and business, and now it is proposed to impose a tax at once upon them, without any ability upon their part to meet that tax. The price of many of these articles is so small that it would either have to jump from 5 to 10 cents or from 10 cents to 15 cents, and therefore it would be made the pretext of increasing the price to the consumer. It would almost double the cost of the article to the consumer and give that much greater benefit to the retail and wholesale seller if they do increase the price to meet the tax.

This is the only solitary article in the whole bill which is treated in that way, and the committee themselves have excluded every article but this one from a similar tax.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Is it not true, if the Senator's amendment prevails, that all of the articles mentioned in this schedule as they are manufactured and sold to the wholesale dealer will have to pay this tax, and by striking out the feature of the committee amendment to which the Senator refers, the tax will simply be paid at one time by the manufacturer? If you strike out the words "wholesale or retail dealers," you make the manufacturer of the drugs pay this tax; and by the amendment you simply propose to have the tax paid at one time, and that by the manufacturer?

Mr. FAULKNER. That is the effect of the amendment; but the Senator does not seem to have caught the real effect of the amendment. Under the provision as it now stands the wholesale or retail dealer would be required to pay on these articles although he has previously bought them from the manufacturer.

Mr. CLAY. I understand that, and I agree with the Senator in regard to his amendment, which is intended to do away with that evil.

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. Simply making the manufacturer pay the tax as the articles are sold.

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes. I have received letters from manufacturers in which they themselves admit that this is the only just way for the payment of the tax, and they are willing to pay the tax.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from West Virginia is not quite accurate, I think, in the statement he has made. This amendment provides that these articles which are in the hands of wholesale and retail dealers need not pay the stamp tax until they are sold by the retail dealer, when the stamp is to be put on.

Mr. FAULKNER. That is true; but still the stamp is put upon the article when sold by the retail dealer.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask to have the amendment read as it will read if the amendment suggested by the Senator from West Virginia be adopted.

Mr. CLAY. If the manufacturer, the wholesale dealer, and the retail dealer each pay the tax, they will pay three times, will they not?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Oh, no; that is not the provision.

Mr. FAULKNER. It may not bear that construction.

Mr. ALLEN. The gravamen of the objection is that the articles that are now manufactured and on the shelves of the wholesale and retail dealers will be taxed, and that the tax ought to apply to articles manufactured hereafter.

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes; those articles which have been bought and are now owned by the wholesalers or retailers.

Mr. ALLEN. I agree with the Senator, and had prepared an amendment to the same effect.
